

Family Council

Editors note: The Family Council consists of a judge, three editors and a women's editor. Each article is a summary of a family disagreement presented to the Council. The Council deals with problems, major and minor, encountered by guidance counselors and social workers. Edited by Mrs. Alma Denny. (Copyright by General Features Corp.)

Mrs. F. W. - Because of a slight blemish she won't go anywhere.

Rima W. - Why parade these ugly blotches? I'll go to a doctor, but nowhere else.

Mrs. F. W. - When I received a notice from the P.T.A. that the students were going to offer a debate on nuclear testing at the next meeting, I was sure Rima would be one of the participants. She's the current events reporter on the high school paper and has written a series of articles on the Geneva Conference and other talks about the topic.

But it's the same old story. She has a faint "strawberry mark" on her cheek and she thinks nobody looks at any other part of her but that. As a child she didn't mind it. We called it "an angel's kiss." When she grew self-conscious about it, I bought her a cosmetic that masks it. She's been mixing a little more lately, so I thought the problem was solved. But now she's again backing down from group activities. She's an attractive girl and she's letting her imagination make too much of a slight imperfection.

Rima W. - My mother is plain blind. Maybe all fond parents are. I'm 18 years old and in a high school where how-you look is more important than what you know, how you feel, how you act or anything else. And what my mother calls a slight imperfection, well - look at it. It's the map of Australia spread across my face. That goo she bought me just makes it all the more conspicuous.

Even though my folks think it's nothing and I should forget about it, it's on my mind constantly. I want to go to a skin specialist about it. But years ago some doctor told my mother it would get lighter and fade, so she won't listen to anyone else. It's no lighter, it spoils my appearance, and if I can't get rid of it I certainly won't walk around displaying it.

That's why I backed out of the debate in school. I'll be in the audience.

The Council: Fond parents aren't blind, Rima. It's the "non-fonds" who are. The fond ones see a teen-ager's pain and try to assuage it in practical, common-sense ways. We think your mother has done this. But we also think she's ready to try a more serious approach in view of your growing distress and unnatural aloofness. Fondness fits the moves to the calls.

Parents of any teen-ager suffer not only from him, but for him and with him. Much of our suffering comes from the hands-off frustration of not being able to do anything to help him. So much of the help must come from inside himself, from his readiness and receptivity. But on one type of worry - the teen-ager's appearance, his health and grooming - a parent may safely enlist outside aid and then help the youngster follow through.

Rima's obsession about her facial blemish needs two types of attention, dermatological and psychological. But since more and more specialists these days are psychiatrically oriented - that is, aware of the psychological factors operating in the conditions they treat - a visit to one good skin man may suffice. That "map" Rima describes is called a "capillary hemangioma" and we read of miraculous results in removing such blemishes by tattooing. Teen-agers are reported so improved that they plunge into school and social activities after one or two treatments. The point we make is that Rima's anguish can probably be eased on the physical front, and we urge Mrs. W. to get busy in that direction.

As to the emotional restoration necessary for Rima's participation in teen-age tangents, we think it's a do-it-yourself possibility. Once her outer appearance is more controllable, she can summon her inner beauty, her zest, insight and interests to complete her attractiveness.
