Lack of Harmony Between Parents Blamed in Report

By DELOS SMITH
UPI Science Editor

New York (UPI)—Of 100 male adolescents whose juvenile delinquency was unmanageable enough to get them into a mental hospital, only 10 came from homes "broken" by divorce, separation of parents or the death of one parent.

But more than 90 came from homes in which there was consistent lack of harmony between parents. Furthermore, continued the reporting psychiatrists, "the father frequently failed to set a healthy example for identification and to exercise firm leadership."

Drs. Harry H. Moorhead and Robert McKinley of the Westchester division of New York hospital were discussing the social and economic cream of juvenile delinquents, that is those from homes which offer the surface "advantages" and have both the means and the knowledge to get the best treatment medical science can offer.

"Of significant importance was the type of mother who was immature and inclined to be indulgent and even seductive in her attitude toward the patient," they continued. "This was manifested in two-thirds of the mothers by prolonging infantile dependence and by too much fondling."

Difficult Period

Even at best adolescence is a difficult period in everyone's life, they said in their report to the Medical Society of the State of New York. "It has been referred to by some as a disease which, hopefully, will run its course as quickly as possible."

"There are only a few standards or rules which can be applied to the adolescent, and one of these is a tendency to upset all standards and rules. The adolescent is confronted with marked psychologic and biologic changes which he comprehends poorly. Despite his many anxieties and uncertainties he no longer allows himself to be directed by adults."

In many of their 100 male adolescents there were "serious and deep-seated difficulties acting to block normal maturation" which were superimposed upon "the more common and more usual adolescent problems." Adolescence had served to trigger these pre-existing "difficulties."

In pushing the excessively disturbed adolescent toward hospital treatment, there should be no "deals" and no "trickery," they said. "It is far preferable to utilize the police or some other determined show of force than to threaten, persuade, cajole or bribe the patient. He will almost always, at a later date, appreciate the fact that others had the good sense to act for him when he was unable to act for himself."

To Learn About Selves

The essence of the treatment is to enable the adolescents to learn about themselves through discussions, through their controlled relationships with other patients and the hospital staff and through practical experiences which are set up for them.

The scientific treatment of extreme adolescent difficulties has guide-lines for all adults striving to deal with adolescent problems of whatever kind, the psychiatrists said.

"The adolescent is quickly aware of sham sincerity and disinterest. He is impressed by how a person behaves and what a person says. Over and above all, the adolescent expects and has a right to expect that those about him will have a point of view, a set of values and a mature philosophy of life. The adolescent is incapable of growing in a void."
