

Contact Adjustment Easier For Children

South Bend, Ind.—(UPI)—Children seem to take to contact lenses wearing with more enthusiasm than grownups, Dr. John R. Cassaday, of South Bend, reports in Pediatric Herald, a publication for doctors.

"Not only are youngsters comparatively easy to fit," he said, "but they adapt quickly to the lenses and wear them without discomfort." Most children will wear the lenses 10 to 12 hours a day by the end of the third week, the doctor has found.

'Shared Time' Gains Support Of Protestant Church Leaders

By LOUIS CASSELS
UPI Correspondent

By ruling prayer out of public schools, the Supreme Court last week spurred Protestants to take a fresh interest in the "shared time" approach to education.

The "shared time" idea was put forward by Dr. Harry L. Stearns, superintendent of public schools at Englewood, N. J. He proposed that children be allowed to take some courses in public schools and others in the church-related schools.

The plan has been widely discussed during the past year by religious leaders.

Until now, however, primary emphasis has been placed on what "shared time" would mean to Catholics. It has been pointed out that parochial school students could attend public schools for instruction in such "neutral" subjects as math, foreign languages, home economics, shop and physical education. This would relieve the financial pressure on parochial schools, and give tax-paying Catholic parents the satisfaction of getting some use out of the public schools they help to support.

Some Protestant leaders have found "shared time" attractive as a way of heading off Catholic demands for direct public aid to parochial schools, which they regard as unconstitutional.

But there has been relatively little discussion of the opportunities which "shared time" would open for Protestant parents who want their children to receive an adequate religious education.

Dr. Stearns had hoped, when he first advanced his idea, that many Protestants would welcome the chance to put their children into religious schools for several hours each day, without going all the way into a system of Protestant parochial schools.

If Protestants haven't shown much interest in this possibility in the past, one reason is that many of them have been clinging to the belief that children could be given at least a measure of religious orientation in public schools.

Belief Dies
The Supreme Court blasted that belief when it ruled, 6-1 that it is unconstitutional for any state to prescribe religious exercises in its public schools.

The elimination of these widely prevalent "opening exercises" may not be any great loss to religious education. It is hard to believe that a child learns much about God from the rote recital of a required prayer or from hearing a fellow student mumble through

Agency Established To Survey Hospitals

Chicago—UPI—The Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals is an agency established by four organizations—the American College of Physicians, American College of Surgeons, American Hospital Association and the American Medical Association.

A hospital displaying the commission's accreditation certificate shows it conforms to hang standards of patient care. To receive the certificate, the hospital must voluntarily submit to a survey of its facilities and its patient care.

the reading of a few verses from a psalm.

But prayer and Bible reading in public schools have had a tremendous symbolic value for many Protestant parents. They have made it possible for parents to persuade themselves that the modest amount of religious training which their children received at home and at Sunday School was somehow being "reinforced" by the public school program.

Must Face Reality

The Supreme Court ruling means that Protestant parents must now face up to reality. And the reality is that the average Protestant child is not receiving much religious education. Even if he attends Sunday School faithfully he gets only about 25 hours of solid instruction a year.

Some Protestants have reacted to the ruling by denouncing the Supreme Court and talking about a Constitutional amendment to permit public school religious exercises which parents have found so comforting.

Others, however, are already looking beyond this kind of emotional response to see what constructive steps the Protestant churches can take to provide children with the kind of religiously oriented educational experience which is now quite obviously ruled out of the public schools.

Two Solutions

One solution is to start building a lot of full-time Protestant parochial schools. There was a strong trend in this direction even before the court's ruling and it will doubtless be accelerated now.

Another solution is "shared time." Since most Protestant churches already have extensive classroom facilities which are idle six days a week, they would need only to hire a staff of professional teachers. A curriculum might include English, history and other courses with a high "value" content, as well as explicitly religious courses, such as Bible study.

Will Protestants adopt this option on a large scale? Protestant leaders to whom this question was put said they can't tell yet what the ultimate answer will be. But there was general agreement that Protestants now have a new and compelling motive for examining the pros and cons of "shared time."

Ownership In Tree Farms On Increase

Washington—UPI—The white collar worker who sits at a desk and longs for his own tree farm is doing something about it.

American Forest Products Industries, the national Tree Farm sponsor, reports that investment ownership of tree farms in the nation has jumped 23 per cent in the past 10 years—from 10 per cent to 33 per cent of all tree farm ownerships, including farm and industrial.

Do-It-Yourself Not Always Inexpensive

New York—UPI—It does not always follow that money is saved when do-it-yourselfers make new furniture or remodel the house, the American Bankers' association (ABA) cautions.

There may be expensive tools to be purchased or rented and sometimes accidents, followed by medical bills, occur.
