MY MOST INSPIRING MOMENT

From the Ashes We Rebuild

"MONSIEUR MAUROIS!" said the conciergerie. "What a joy to see you after such a long time!"

I had not set foot in my house for five years. I had left Paris in 1940, the day before the Nazis entered the city. In the meantime, I had lived in England, America, Algeria, Tunisia, and Italy. In 1943, I had belonged to the small French expeditionary force that reconquered Corsica. But Corsica was not my home. A return to Paris was quite a different thing and much more moving.

"Your poor mother! She would have been so happy to see you!"

My mother had been arrested by the Gestapo though she was over 80. She had endured her imprisonment with patience and courage. Then the excitement and happiness of liberation had been too much for her. A few days after her return to this house, where she used to live with us, she had died of a heart attack.

The conciergerie continued: "Her last words were: 'I must live until my son comes back.' Now you are back and she is not here to greet you. Such a brave old lady! It's unfair."

I had, of course, been informed of her death, but it was painful to realize that the dear wrinkled face would smile lovingly no more.

OUR APARTMENT was on the fourth floor, overlooking the Bois de Boulogne. It had been occupied by a Captain Goering, nephew of Hermann Goering.

"For a while he behaved decently enough," the conciergerie said, "but when he understood their armies were beaten and had to run away, he became furious. He ordered his men to break your furniture and to burn your curtains. We cleared the mess the best way we could."

So I was prepared for the worst. Yet when I entered the apartment, I could not help shrieking with pain. My walls had been lined with books, thousands of books chosen with love and care, year in and year out, most of them required for my work, many given by fellow-writers with friendly dedications.

My books had been my most precious treasure. I lived with them, knew every one of them and where to find it. Balzac's place was just opposite my desk, under Dickens. Stendhal was behind me and I had only to stretch out my arm for his novels. I would have been able to find

His country devastated, his home looted, this famous author faced the future
in despair—yet from despair came something "finer than ever"

By ANDRÉ MAUROIS

I stood there, my heart shrieking with pain. But my wife was resolute: she would rebuild my library.
