Small Worlds Around Us

Pity the Poor Barnacle—He Has To Use His Head

The prospect of standing on one's head for an entire lifetime is certainly not a pleasant one. It would be especially tiresome when one also would have constantly to wave one's legs in the air all that time.

But this is exactly what happens to the barnacle. To him and her it's a way of life. The mother barnacle "casts her eggs upon the waters."

Little specks of dust in a windstorm can have but little future and chance in the wide waters of the sea, but that's where Mrs. Barnacle puts them. In the warm waters, however, they do hatch into tiny, free-swimming larvae that have no shell or sense of direction.

The baby barnacles swim with a butterfly motion just under the surface of the water. Instead of wings or fins they have "swimming legs." Like their relatives the crabs, they "moult" a few times and a hard shell forms over the body.

During some stage of their swimming they ram their heads into some solid obstruction. It makes little difference whether they hit a board, a rock, boat or bottle. As soon as a contact is made the head becomes attached, the "swimming legs are shed or absorbed and the little barnacle is attached for life.

The barnacles show some preference as to where they land and attach themselves according to species. For instance, the rock barnacles wouldn't be caught dead on the bottom of a ship. Neither would a ship barnacle ever attach his pointed little head to the shell of a turtle, or to the underside of a whale.

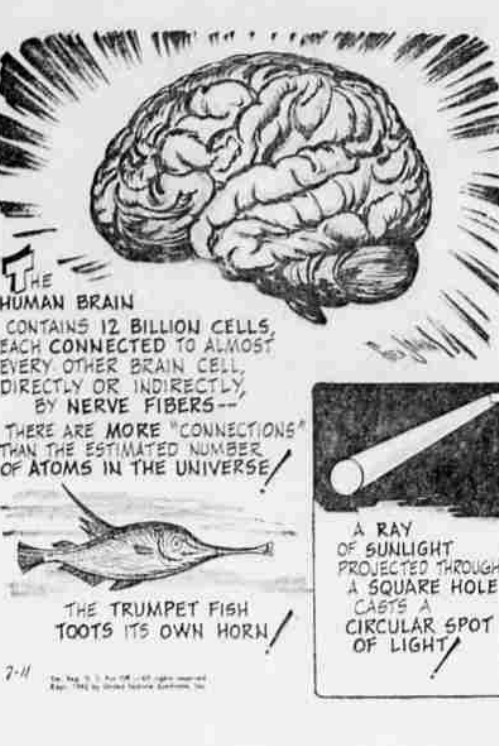

All barnacles are sensitive to vibrations. The ones who attach themselves to ships are accustomed to the peculiar jolts and jars and think nothing of it. But the rock barnacles, under like conditions, would die of nervous frustrations. They might even starve to death, since when they are alarmed they close up the shell.

When everything gets quiet, they wave their feeding legs, forcing a stream of food-bearing water into their mouths. The movement of the legs of a colony of barnacles shows a clock-wise regularity. When feeding, a mass of barnacles presents a different picture from that of a non-feeding colony; the moving legs makes the difference.

The point of attachment, between the barnacle and its
