Try and Stop Me

By BENNETT CERF

IN A SLEEPY little town the two passenger trains of the day were met faithfully by an antique buggy, driven by a bewhiskered octogenarian, and hitched to a pair of spavined nags who looked even older.

One day a travelling salesman actually got off the morning train, climbed into the hack and ordered, "Drive me to the main hotel." In due course he was deposited in front of the hotel (the only one in a radius of 35 miles) and pulled out his wallet. The smallest bill he could find was a five-spot, and this he handed to the old driver. The old man studied the bill for several minutes, then declared, "It's a deal, mister. The horses and buggy are yours!"

John Fischer, erudite editor of Harper's, spotted a beloved child perched precariously on the peaked roof of a barn and asked her what she was doing there. "Her answer," says Fischer, "covered the situation like a horse blanket." She called down, "I'm trying not to fall off."

An octogenarian friend of Bill Feather confessed to him sadly, "I can see pretty well with my bifocals, and hear pretty well with my new invisible hearing aid, and eat pretty well with my new teeth, but my, I do miss my mind!"

Riddle of the week: What happens when you get stung by a bee and bitten by a mosquito simultaneously? Answer: You sting along with itch.

The Family Council

Editor's note: The Family Council consists of a judge, a psychiatrist, three clergymen, three editors and a women's editor. Each article is a summary of a family disagreement presented to the Council. The Council deals with problems, major and minor, encountered by guidance counselors and social workers. Edited by Mrs. Alma Denny. (Copyright by General Features Corp.)

Emma J.—I let my son go to the movies every week, no matter what.

Frances A.—My boy nags to go along, but I'm fussy about what he sees.

Emma J.—My friend Frances and I keep arguing about her strictness over letting her son Burt go to the movies Saturday afternoons.

Burt and my son Josh are best friends. And Josh has twice as good a time at the movies when Burt is along. The trouble is Burt isn't along very often. Frances only lets him go to pictures which she herself, or her husband, or someone she knows has seen. She insists it make a tremendous difference in how a child turns out. She really believes that boys get ideas from certain movies.

That's ridiculous. Josh laughs at them all. He knows they're all make-believe, just put together for entertainment. He knows they could never happen in real life. If Frances impressed that on Burt, she'd have nothing to worry about and the boys could enjoy more shows together.

Frances A.—Maybe Josh and his parents are more hard-boiled and less impressionable than I am. But I get nightmares from some movies. And others are dangerous because they twist things completely, but make it all sound so true and convincing that a young person who doesn't know life can well believe it all.

It's bad enough for Burt to waste his eyesight and his attention on some of the TV tripe. I give him some leeway there, when his homework is done. After all, it's usually only a half-hour, broken up with commercials. And he can turn to me or his father for quick explanations and reassurance.

But at the movies, alone with Josh, he'll swallow the hogwash without question. He has movie idols and whatever comes out of their mouths is gospel to him. Add Technicolor and music and he's "hooked." That's why I must know exactly what Hollywood is filling his head with.

The Council: Here's another one of those chicken-or-egg topics where discussion can go on endlessly unless limited to one specific issue. We offer one, even though it is reminiscent of the old song title, "Who takes care of the caretaker's daughter while the caretaker's busy taking care?" We ask, "Who helps a parent help a child to see the right movies?" True, there are listings in some magazines and newspapers. But since the classifications are prepared by special interest groups, some parents have reservations about accepting them and fall back upon their personal knowledge of the film in question.

Emma's position, that of preparing one's children at home for anything, has long been the comfortable one of permissive parents. The fallacy, however, lies in the "anything" of that tenet. Parents who haven't been to the movies in a long while had better check up so that they may know whether their children really are being fortified for the emotional and intellectual assaults they encounter in "The Children's Section."

We'd question Emma's claim that everything just rolls off her son's back. The newspapers revealed that it was a 1943 picture, "Wake Island," which changed the course of Astronaut Carpenter's life, inspiring him to become an airman.

Since Frances admittedly can't get to as many movies as her son would like to see, she may want to obtain some measure of guidance from a private bulletin, "The Green Sheet," which offers a composite of 10 highly respected lists.

Small Worlds Around Us

The Sea Robin Swims or Flies, but Prefers To Walk

Nature sure departed from the conventional when she designed the rather common marine fish, commonly called the sea robin.

We didn't do much better when we named this creature. Just because it is reddish in color and has wings, or what appear to be wings, we likened it to a bird. With the exception of the red color and the enlarged fins, all resemblance to a robin is lacking.

This is an odd-shaped fish, a fish that can swim, walk and comes very close to being able to fly. At least it flies through the water.

But it prefers to walk, and on stilts at that, along the bottom of the sea if the water is not too deep, using its finger-like legs that are attached to the underside of the body just ahead of the wings. The wings actually are greatly enlarged pectoral fins.

Beady Eyes

Seldom over a foot long, the sea robin is a weird-looking creature with a high dorsal fin along its back, wicked-looking, beady, black eyes and a vicious expression on its pointed face. The odd-shaped body is armored with bony plates. The wings, when extended out from the body allow the fish to float in the water at any selected level.

Nature evidently wasn't satisfied with one species of these fish, so she designed a dozen or more of various sizes and degrees of coloration. There are the rosy, the soldier, the southern, the spotted and the slender.

Mostly all are under a foot in overall length, but all are fiendish looking. Just back of the large head, the body slopes back in a regular fishy form. But forward is where Nature's drawing board must have tilted.

ed, for under the head are the three curved, finger-like projections which serve as walking stilts, and above these are the tremendously enlarged pectoral fins, or wings.

If we are able to locate a sea robin in shallow water, we notice the little jerk is propped up on his walking fingers, his back parts resting on the bottom. This is his normal standing or resting position, body sloped upward, standing on the bony projections that serve as walking legs. Stir the water a little to start him off, and he begins to walk, the tail dragging along behind.

Slap the water; this scares him, and he stops teetering along and spreads his wings, taking off with a push from his fingers and a swish of the tail.

But even if he leaves in a hurry, he won't go far; he forgets that he was frightened and settles down on his ridiculous legs on the ocean bottom.

Racine, Wis.—If red or maroon cars usually look brighter to you, it may not be just the paint job. A national survey conducted by S. C. Johnson & Son, Inc., local wax manufacturers, showed that owners of autos painted in those colors are the most frequent users of car polish.
