Tax Revision Bill Approved By Committee

Washington (UPI) - The Senate Finance Committee Tuesday approved a sharply cut, money-losing version of the administration's tax revision bill.

The legislation, as it came out of the committee, could cost the treasury an estimated $750 million a year in revenue. As passed by the House in March, the bill would have raised about $120 million in revenues by closing tax loopholes. But drastic revisions in the Senate committee turned it into a potential money-loser.

The committee earlier had killed a controversial section which would have provided for withholding of federal income tax on dividends and interest. In a key action Tuesday, the committee dropped earlier language which would have permitted tax reduction for such business entertainment as a "prudent man" would claim. It substituted language to allow reduction of entertainment expenses "directly associated with the active conduct of trade or business."

Committee officials said the provision recognized the "business association of good will entertainment," such as business lunches.
