Teen-Agers Are Hired To Detect Shoplifting

By GAY PAULEY UPI Women's Editor
New York —UPI— A steady increase nationally in the number of teen-age shoplifters had led one New York-based chain of stores to install a "little brother" system of watching you.

Riley said they were hired on the basis of maturity, interest in the protection field, and department store experience. Most of them after graduation hope to become criminologists, sociologists or social workers.

Teen-Agers a 'Major Threat'

One report circulated among retailers said this age group "in the past few years has become a major threat to the retail store. . . . These young delinquents are a big problem for food chains, variety stores, drug stores, hardware stores and department stores."

Store's Greatest Problem

The National Retail Merchants association had no estimate of losses especially due shoplifting. But it said all types of store "shrinkage" — from breakage, carelessly kept records, thievery by in-store personnel as well as by outsiders — average 1.5 per

We hear that the National Safety Council has a new problem to worry about. It seems that an increasing number of Americans are being injured each year because they try to walk through glass doors. One report said that the council had appointed a committee to study the problem and offer solutions. One person was quoted as saying the doors should be made of some other non-breakable, clear material such as plastic.

Well, Brother-in-law Henry solved his glass door problem and very inexpensively. The door became a problem soon after installation — Henry and two or three of his guests tried to walk through when it was closed. No one was seriously injured, but heads were bumped and the individuals felt quite silly. We know they did, because this happened once to us — we tried to walk through a glass door at the Shasta ski lodge, and were frightfully mortified.

Henry decided that what was needed was something to call attention to the fact that the glass was there, something decorative and yet not too conspicuous. He at length pasted to the glass, about half-way up the door, three plastic decals of similar, sunburst design in varying sizes. They work. Occupants of the house going back and forth through the door to the patio scarcely notice the ornaments, but no one has tried to walk through the closed door since.

Mrs. Theodore O. Wedel, new assistant general secretary for program for the National Council of Churches, and a past president of the United Church Women, says that Christian women of this nation are beginning to turn their attentions "outward" instead of "inward." In an interview with Jessie Ash Arndt, carried in the Christian Science Monitor earlier this summer, Mrs. Wedel said that she and her husband, Honorary Canon of Washington Cathedral and instructor of theology, as well as many other Christians, believe that "there is an awakening to the interpretation of Christian service in terms of individual Christian living and the ministering to human need."

She believes that Christian women will work toward setting up interfaith activities with Roman Catholic and Jewish women, and says that efforts are being made to improve race relations. She also noted that men and women are working more closely together in churches and said "perhaps the last stronghold of segregation of men and women is the church."

Mrs. Wedel noted that the United Church Women recently began to develop concern for the place of the employed woman in the activities of the church; she is the author of a book "Employed Women and the Church." As a member of President Kennedy's committee on the Status of Women and chairman of the subcommittee on New and Expanded Services for Women, she thinks much could be done to make life easier for the woman who holds a job in business or industry. She listed child-care for working mothers and housekeeping help.

This thoughtful woman believes that the spirit of voluntary service has been dampened in this country by the increasing tendency of government to take over welfare services and says there is an increasing willingness to leave everything to a paid staff—even in the churches.

Mrs. Wedel hopes that "a revival of the spirit of the volunteer will be one result of emphasis on the responsibility of the individual to take his Christian living into his community life, his politics and his concern for international affairs." O.S.

Dermatologist Explains Treatment of Aging Skin

Editor's Note: Turn back the hands of time leaving a zig-zag trail of wrinkles on your face? Advances in the treatment of prematurely aging skin sometimes accomplish that seemingly remarkable feat. In the following dispatch, the third of three, you'll learn how it's done.

New York —UPI— It's never too early or too late to do something about aging skin. Although aging itself cannot be arrested, some of its signs need not be inevitable. Some can be prevented with protection and proper skin care.

Others can be eliminated through surgery, such as a "resurfacing" operation in which the upper layer of skin is planned off.

These are the conclusions of medical researchers looking into the problem of how skin grows old.

Many Factors "Many factors play a role in the aging of skin," says Dr. John M. Knox, associate professor of dermatology at Baylor university college of medicine, Houston, Tex.

These include heredity, disease and metabolic disturbances. As one grows older, many functions of the skin undergo a gradual decline. The glands beneath the surface become less active, and the network of supportive connective tissue loses much of its elasticity. The result: wrinkles and a dry, coarse skin.

Sunlight appears to be the most common cause of skin that grows old before its time. Compares With a team of Baylor researchers, Dr. Knox compared light and dark-skinned persons, those who work outdoors and those who work inside. They found greater evidence of skin damage among light-skinned people who work outdoors. There were
