Senator Ellender Presents Films Showing Russian Pumpkin Harvest

Washington (UPI)—It used to be my custom to invite friends in for an evening of home movie viewing. Before long I didn't have but one friend left, and he hated me. So when I saw this notice that Sen. Allen J. Ellender was going to show some home movies in the Senate Office building auditorium, I felt, out of compassion, and obligation to attend. I figured that if I didn't show up, the senator would have the auditorium to himself. But to my surprise, and maybe to his, there was a goodly crowd on hand. If being a senator means you can get people to watch your home movies, then I'm announcing my candidacy right now.

Ellender, a Louisiana Democrat, has been making round-the-world trips in recent years as an emissary of the Senate Appropriations Committee. Like any other tourist, he takes along a camera. But unlike other traveling congressmen, he pays some of his own expenses. When we had assembled in the auditorium, Ellender told us, in an accent redolent of the bayou country, that we were going to see some shots of "Moe S. Coe." I was still wondering who Moe might be when the screen lighted up and there was Ellender waving at us from in front of the Kremlin. Moscow was only the first stop. He also took us, via the magic lantern, to more remote areas of the Soviet Union, including a collective farm where we watched a pumpkin harvest. Although the film was a black and white silent, Ellender dubbed in a narration that helped us identify what we were seeing. It's a good thing he did, for without it I would never have guessed that those Russian peasants were harvesting pumpkins. I thought they were playing a Soviet version of soccer. In filming his adventures, Ellender paid the same painstaking attention to detail as in the written reports on his journeys, one of which included the observation that the canals in Holland were filled with water. For instance, he informed us that the Volga river "is used for transportation and fishing," and that hogs were being raised "for breeding and slaughter." All in all, it was a most enjoyable travelogue which I hope will serve to stimulate public interest in viewing home movies. If ever you should desire to see a 30-minute film showing my son cutting his first tooth in slow motion, don't hesitate to give me a ring.

The negotiations were announced in Washington and Ottawa Tuesday night, to begin the week of Aug. 27. Rep. Al Ullman (D-Ore.) proposed a bill which would give President Kennedy authority to set quotas on lumber imports from Canada unless Canada entered into negotiations for voluntary controls. Ullman said he felt the legislation was necessary to strengthen the U.S. hand in the talks. However, chances of final House and Senate action on the bill before adjournment appeared remote. The subject strikes at the heart of Canada's balance of payments woes, and the talks were expected to begin cautiously. The U.S. negotiators were expected to begin by exploring the facts of the lumber problem before trying to inch toward a hoped-for mutual agreement on a solution. Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), who had been one of the most insistent in demanding action to bolster the Northwest lumber industry, said he was "very hopeful that Canada will enter into an agreement for a voluntary quota."

Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), said "I am very pleased that the Canadians responded so graciously on this matter, the quicker we will be able to sit down and determine the equities." The talks on Canadian lumber exports to the United States were one phase of a six-point program announced by Kennedy after a meeting with lumber state congressmen last month. Sen. Maurine B. Neuberger (D-Ore.) said she would rather see action on other points of the program, domestic measures, in order to bolster equal competition without quotas. Not in Sympathy "I'm glad they're beginning talks, but I'm really not in sympathy with import quotas," Mrs. Neuberger said. She said quotas would be out of step with President Kennedy's trade bill, which aims at expanding foreign trade through lowering trade barriers. She called for revision of a U.S. law that requires Northwest lumbermen to use high-cost U.S.-flag vessels in shipping goods to the East Coast. Amendment of the law, the

Air Service Patrons Treated at Hospital

Mrs. Anna Simonson, Smith River, Calif., is reported in fair condition at Sacred Heart hospital, where she is being treated for injuries received in an auto accident near Crescent City Sunday. Mrs. Simonson was flown to Medford by Mercy Flights, Inc., from the accident scene and transferred to the hospital. She was the 1455th person flown by the air service.

Also flown recently by Mercy Flights were Lee Ann Navarette, 7, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Navarette, 1340 Fortune drive, and Mrs. Navarette. They were involved in an accident near Creswell, Ore., Tuesday, and Lee Ann received a broken leg. She is reported in good condition by Sacred Heart hospital, where she is being treated.

Constitutional Draft Said Near Completion

Salem (UPI)—Draft of virtually all of the proposed new state constitution which the Constitutional Revision Commission will submit to the 1963 legislature is expected to be completed next Monday or Tuesday.

JUST PRACTICING

Hammond, Ind.—(UPI)—Virgil Tinskey bagged five wild ducks in a gasoline storage tank field before police arrived to stop him from hunting without a license. Without a federal duck stamp, out of season and within the city limits, Tinskey said "I was just practicing my duck call."
