Per Capita Use of Red Meat Expected Near Rate of 1961

Washington — U.S. Department of Agriculture estimated the per capita consumption of red meats this year will be near the 1961 rate of 161 pounds.

Production of all red meat in 1962 currently is expected to total about 28.9 billion pounds or slightly more than 1 per cent above the 1961 output. Prospective increases are divided about equally between beef and pork. The increase in production plus imports about equal to a year earlier will not be as great proportionately as the increase in population. The per person rate of consumption, therefore, will be about the same as in 1961.

In a review of the livestock and meat situation, the department said average retail meat prices likely will increase this summer and average as high or a little higher than a year before.

Beef prices, however, are not expected to change much during the remainder of this summer. They are expected to edge lower this fall and by late fall probably will be below a year earlier.

Retail real prices, which have generally exceeded those of a year earlier so far, are expected to ease somewhat but likely will continue to be above those of last summer and fall.

Lamb and mutton retail prices likely will be well above those of last summer and fall.

The department said that meat animal prices, supported by stronger demand, at mid-year were generally above those of a year ago.

Seasonal increases in livestock marketings now are under way. This year's calf crop is expected to be 2 per cent larger than in 1961, but most of these animals will be retained on farms. The cattle and calf inventory is expected to increase again this year, probably by about two million head.

Relatively stable fed cattle prices seem probable through the remainder of the summer.

Little Change Expected

Beef prices, however, are not expected to change much during the remainder of this summer. They are expected to edge lower this fall and by late fall probably will be below a year earlier.
