South Viet Nam Farmers Aided By Ohio Man

Columbus, Ohio—(UPI)—Carl Hutchinson was near retirement three years ago when he began an adventure that took him smack in the center of Communist terrorism.

It happened in South Viet Nam and Hutchinson was surrounded with the kind of cloak and dagger tactics most people prefer merely to read about.

For 22 years Hutchinson, was assistant director of adult education for the Ohio Farm Bureau.

He became interested in a program with a name almost as long as his journey—The Fund for International Cooperative Development of the U.S.A., of which the bureau is a member.

Hutchinson, then in his 60s, arranged for a leave of absence and went to Viet Nam where a typical day might include sabotage, subversion and general terrorism.

"The Vietnamese Communists disguise themselves as loyal citizens by day," Hutchinson said, "and destroy roads and bridges and spread terror throughout the countryside by night."

Hutchinson, along with his wife, Helen, worked in the Mekong and Dong Nai valleys, and lived in Saigon.

He served as a technical advisor in a training school for farmers and said the program was "tremendously effective because we were working directly with common people."

He expressed fears concerning U.S. programs in foreign lands—that the United States often fails because it ignores the common people and works through local and oriental government.

"They try to tell the farmers instead of trying to win the farmers," he said, "We tried to win the farmers and it works."

The adventure is all over now for Hutchinson. He's 65 and he's retired. And how does he feel about it?

Michigan Nursery Owner Tours Tree Planting Program in Area

Eagle Point—It is just unbelievable," was the repeated comment from Earl Hovingh, owner of the Belmont Tree Nursery in Belmont, Mich., as he accompanied members of the Eagle Point Grange on a tour of the organization's tree planting project.

Hovingh was so impressed with the results that he offered 250,000 trees from 12 to 18 inches high for the program for digging and freight costs. The rate is equivalent to the price paid last year for smaller trees.

Among the selections of trees included in the group is the Norway Spruce, which is in demand because it grows well in this area.

Eagle Point Grange Service Chairman C. C. Hoover showed his scrap book, thousands of letters from both children and professional adults, poems and drawings as well as reviewing the program put on by the Grangers this past year.

The Hovinghs said they were astonished at the interest shown in the program by so many people who lived within a short distance of vast timber areas.

Older Trees Dying
Many of the valley's older trees, including oak, are slowly dying, and evergreen trees now being planted will replace them and keep the valley green in future years, Hoover noted.

Landscape artists in southern Oregon have been consulted so trees may be distributed in a way that will provide colors throughout the valley.

Hoover says he feels he should pass on information gained through experience and experiments during the past two years to make the program a success.

A professor in Roseburg added growth to his trees by placing the wrapped tree in wet peat moss for three weeks prior to planting, Hoover said. These trees had been soaked for four hours in hormones and wrapped in compost and newspaper when given to him by the Grange. Melvin Nealy started an experiment of freezing the plants during their dormant period, then growing them in a hot house until ready to plant in the yard.

Hoover said shipping dates of trees should be scheduled to eliminate week end lay over. On receipt, trees should be soaked in water for four hours to revive. Hormones added to water show excellent results, he said.

Trees will grow better the first year if planted in slower beds where they are protected or potted in cans or flower pots. One should be sure holes are punched in cans for proper drainage and to avoid drowning, Hoover said. Potted trees may be set in a larger vessel of water to allow suction of water from the bottom. The hard crust of dirt should be broken when watering trees from the top.

Trees planted in a pasture should be protected from animals by a fence. Plastic strips wrapped from the ground to about 10 inches high will keep small animals from eating trees, Hoover noted.

Trees may be mulched with hay or straw or 2-foot plastic circle to keep weeds and grass from choking tree; keep well watered; use cheese cloth as sun shade on hot days and select the type of trees that grow well in their particular surroundings, Hoover advised.

Lists Several Trees
In selecting trees, the Eagle Point Grange said the following trees have grown well: incense cedar is drought resistant and excellent on the desert; locust is one of fastest growing trees and is disease resistant; Chinese elm is fast growing with a tendency to split in later years; Russian Olive is fast growing; Hondu spruce is good for small yards; the Norway spruce is more in demand as the best grower for this area; the white spruce is good, and the Colorado blue spruce is the favorite of the youngsters; Sitka has had heavy losses in the first two years of development in this area with the nursery location being geographically wrong.

Weeping willow trees are better in pastures if fenced from cattle until a good sized tree; birch is desirable with several planted over the past two years and doing well; silver poplar is a good pasture tree, the Grange added. Redwood trees are being planted and are growing successfully.

Nitrogen should be used on the trees regularly, according to instructions, the Grange noted. One teaspoon of sulphate of ammonia spread on the dirt every month from February to August is good fertilizer, Hoover said.

Youngsters in the valley who have lost trees may have them replaced by the Eagle Point grange if Hoover is contacted.
