Memphis Cotton Industry Capitol

By MARY TOBIN
United Press International
Memphis, Tenn. (UPI)—The big sternwheeler, laden with cotton bales, chugged slowly to the foot of the levee where roustabouts and Negro slaves waited to unload the valuable cargo.

The riverboat threw down its lines. Dozens of hands began moving the 500 pound bales on the cobblestones sloping down to the Mississippi river.

The Negroes pushed the bales on sled-like contraptions called drays, and mules hauled the loads up the levee to Front st.

This was Memphis in the 1800s, shipping and marketing America's "white gold"—cotton.

Since cotton production first rose to prominence as an industry nearly 200 years ago, Memphis has been the hub of a wheel that spreads from the cotton fields of the West to the states of the deep South.

Hailed as the "Cotton Capital of the World" and the world's biggest spot cotton market, Memphis handles the buying, selling and shipping of about 40 per cent of the entire crop each year, more than any other center.

Same Location
The cotton industry still makes its home on historic old Front st., the nation's "cotton row."

High on the bluffs overlooking the river, the street became the heart of the sweaty, multi-million dollar business. Here cotton was and still is bought from the farmers and sold to the textile mills, where all arrangements were made for shipping the bales from plantation to factory.

The riverboat now is almost extinct. Shipping cotton by waterway is mostly a thing of the past.

Yet many of the buildings which housed early cotton firms still operate; many offices occupied by cotton merchants in the 1830s are used now by their grandchildren.

Memphis cotton men sold 6,484,899 (m) bales last year in transactions that stretched across the nation and from Japan to Western Europe. The bulk of the crop was earmarked for textile centers of Alabama, Georgia and the Carolinas, but a large percentage went to the Orient and to Europe.

Modern Methods
Cotton bales sell for an average of $175 each. They are brought overland by rail or truck from farms to strategically located warehouses throughout the cotton belt.

While the cotton is stored, samples are taken from each bale and sent to Memphis where they are classified and categorized. When a buyer is found, the bales are tagged and shipped from the warehouses to their destinations.

A cotton office is downtown Memphis is apt to be a combination of rich mahogany desks and cubbyholes filled with bins of cotton where the classifiers measure samples for length, grade and color.

The cotton merchant is likely to be descended from a family that once owned a prosperous plantation and countless slaves.

Methods of handling cotton have changed. It is produced and picked with mechanical help; bought and sold more efficiently; shipped faster and farther.

But the romance of the bygone days lingers. Negroes still pluck the fluffy bolls in the fall when the fields of the South are dotted white.

The visitor often can find bales of cotton standing by the century-old buildings along Front st.

Construction Workers Get $143.26 Weekly

Salem—UPI—The average weekly wage for contract construction workers in Oregon in June was $143.26, up $3.82 from June, 1961, the Oregon Employment Department said. Construction workers had the highest weekly average wage in Oregon during the month. Apparel workers continued to have the lowest weekly wage in Oregon among production workers, the June average being $66.95, but up $8.03 from the June, 1961 average.

PENSION DURATION

Washington—The final soldier pension for the War of the Revolution was paid to a widow in Vermont in 1906, or just 123 years after the official termination of that conflict.

An estimated 7,000 square miles of salt underlay Ohio.

Better Mileage From Gentle Acceleration

New York—UPI—To get more mileage out of each tankful of gas, warm up the engine by idling it for a few seconds and then driving it gently for a few miles; adopt slow and easy acceleration and steady driving speeds; avoid starting the engine only to run the car a few minutes.

Martin J. Tustin, a designer of economy cars and president of Standard-Triumph Motor company, said the woman who follows these tips will save the cost of several tankfuls of gas in a year and keep her car's maintenance bills down.

EFFICIENCY FACTOR

Schenectady, N.Y.—The electric motor, converting into service about 90 per cent of the energy supplied to it, is rated about five times more efficient than the steam engine.
