Old Joe Held In Exile To Ponder Insurrection In Which Throne Lost

Milwaukee, Wis. (UPI)—Old Joe, 15, the deposed Rhesus king of the Milwaukee Zoo's monkey island, is suffering his exile with dim hopes of a counter-revolution.

Zoo director George Speidel gave the bundle of nervous energy little chance of winning back the throne he had held since 1948.

The scarred and embattled simian lost out in a bloody coup d'etat spearheaded by his son, Joe Jr., and a trusted member of his court, Big Otto.

The 30-pound monkey was being kept in an adjoining monkey house where he was treated for a gash in his right leg, suffered in the insurrection.

Revolution had been brewing for more than three years on the monkey colony, zoo keepers said, and they added it was surprising Old Joe hadn't been ousted earlier.

Old Joe, considered an aging dictator by monkey standards, had been on the downgrade for some time, while it became more and more apparent that Joe Jr. was anxious to succeed his father.

But for 11 years, Old Joe went unchallenged. Then in 1959 a rebel group attacked him and pulled huge tufts of hair from his bushy body.

Speidel hauled Old Joe off the island for three days of rest, but the minute he got back he jumped the first big male he could find, beat him up and took back the throne.

Since last fall, Joe Jr., Big Otto and their dissident followers have held skirmishes against Old Joe, in which he suffered minor wounds and major blows to his pride.

Old Joe couldn't find a single supporter when the latest rebellion broke out.

Held in Isolation

Speidel plans to keep Old Joe isolated in a monkey house for at least three weeks while his wounded leg heals. During this time, though, Joe Jr. and Big Otto probably will get firmly entrenched.

It may even be that Joe Jr. and Big Otto won't permit Old Joe to come back to the island, Speidel said. In that case, a solitary home will have to be found for the ousted ruler.

"I'm afraid his dignity is gone now," said Speidel. "It's not likely he can make a comeback again."
