

Teaching Experiment in Job-Finding Methods Conducted in Portland

Portland—The average job-hunter does not know how or where to sell his work skills on today's labor mart. It pays to teach him how. It is more economical to teach him in a group than alone.

These are some of the conclusions from a six-months teaching experiment in job-finding methods conducted at Portland Community college under the supervision of Ray A. Ziegler, state bureau of labor. They are contained in a pamphlet recently released on a pilot project called "creative job search techniques."

The pamphlet states 700 of 1,000 persons participating in the program within the period found suitable employment. Half of those successful in finding jobs commenced working within two weeks after they had started their search, although the big majority of the participants had been unemployed two months or longer.

All Educational Levels The job-seekers had all levels of educational achievement from under-eighth-grade to post-graduate college degrees. One-third of them were women, ages 16 to 68; the men's ages ranged from 17 to 78. Their experience ran from complete inexperience to executive level.

Classes in the techniques were held without fee two nights a week. Ziegler, who is director of the labor bureau's senior worker division, served as counselor-instructor. Vocational testing assistance and other facilities were provided by the college under the direction of George Hendrickson and the college's technology division headed by Bryce Hanning.

The community experiment was designed to build self-confidence and self-analysis in the unemployed and underemployed, according to Ziegler. He points out that the project "was not aimed at getting anyone a job but motivating individuals to conduct an extensive and systematic search for their own jobs."

Typical Unemployed The report finds "the typical unemployed worker used to a structural life on-the-job in a workaday life completely planned by his employer. Accustomed to being part of a working team he becomes unsure of himself when unemployed. The longer he was employed, the less he understands the strange complexity of his problem."

"While age was found to be a definite adverse factor for the job-seeker in both the 20-minute and 40-plus age groups, older and younger applicants found jobs quickly under the program. Supervisory personnel frequently required six months longer than wage earners in ordinary occupations in finding employment. Most of the class members were considered to have saleable skills but unaware of pertinent points affecting their employability," according to the report.

The pamphlet contains comments on the project by the participants and business firms. It is available at the Portland office of the Bureau of Labor, 486 State Office Building.

Morris To Conduct Lecture on Math

Gordon Morris, of the Medford schools' mathematics department, will be one of the 21 public school teachers conducting lectures on business arithmetic for the fall certificate classes sponsored by the Oregon real estate department and school of business administration, University of Oregon, for real estate brokers and salesmen.

It is essentially eighth grade arithmetic, according to Real Estate Commissioner Robert J. Jensen. A test given an extension class at the university showed the average adult has long ago forgotten his eighth grade arithmetic, he said.

Only three of the 34 taking the test worked all problems correctly. The majority answered less than half correctly.
