Rural America Has Crisis Period, Freeman Declares

Portland - Secretary of Agriculture Orville Freeman said Monday "rural America now faces a period of serious crisis." Freeman keynoted a regional conference on land and people. Freeman said two out of five Americans live on farms or in rural areas. He said their crisis arose from the changes wrought by technological and scientific progress. The agriculture secretary said rural areas can be revitalized only by developing new, multiple-use programs for the land - taking in farming, recreation, timber, water and power supply, storage and wildlife. He stressed recreation. "Rural America - all America - needs all its land in economic use, but not for crops," he said. "Instead, land can be put to paying use for the production of grass, trees and outdoor recreation."

L. M. Dugan Arrives For Area Conference

Lester M. Dugan, district supervisor of Jehovah's Witnesses in the northwestern United States, arrived in Central Point today to serve the three-day training conference scheduled in the Central Point Junior High school gymnasium this week end. Small Worlds Around Us

By LYNN M. WATKINS (Register and Tribune Syndicate 1962)

Might Live with Insects Easier than Our Poisons There is a startling similarity between the gnat straining to swallow a camel - an elephant blundering around to step on a mouse - and many of man's efforts to completely kill off some species of insect. It would seem to be an uneven battle - man, the most intellectual of all living things, against one of the lower forms of life. Toward that end man has developed some drastic methods. But contrary to what some of us "wishful think" ourselves into believing, it has never been done. We have never eliminated from the earthy scene a single species of bug. And unless some misguided soul discovers some chemical powerful enough to do the job, we will continue to have insects as a living part of our ecological family for a long time to come. In the meantime, however, while we are at it we might injure ourselves as well as future generations of human beings. Not all the trouble is the fault of the poisons, either. Some of the fault is ours; we fail to read the labels, or we use a dangerous chemical without knowing what we are doing. The bug you hope to kill by squirting poison on it can't read a single word of printed language. It knows absolutely nothing of the claims made for the insecticide. When you, as the one who is attempting to administer a lethal dose, use the poison without first carefully reading the directions of the container, you are displaying little more intelligence than the bug you are hoping to kill. You might be shocked to discover, if you made some inquiries, how many people - both adults and children - have been sickened, some of them fatally, by the wholesale spraying of insecticides. No one knows for sure how much future suffering is going to be endured by accumulated poisons that the human body is gathering, bit by bit, over a continued length of time. Look over the stock, in any place where insecticides, pesticides and the other poisons are sold. You will be amazed at the number. All are supposed to do what you expect them to do but if they did, there would be a pretty limited sale for most of them after the first purchase. Glorified Squirt There are roughly about three-quarters of a million known kinds of insects, and there would appear to be about that many kinds of poisons designed to kill them. Many of us glorify in the squirting of poison chemicals.
