McShane Is Head Of Enforcing Law Of Constitution

By FREDERICK H. TRESH
 United Press International
 Just before midnight, Nov. 9, 1959, Patrolman James Joseph Patrick McShane was walking his beat in a tough neighborhood on Manhattan's west side.
 Suddenly, two men ran from a grocery store toward an automobile cruising slowly on Columbus ave. McShane sprang for the car, too, and brought his nightstick thundering down on the driver's head. He turned, gun-in-hand, as the other two men started to run.
 "Halt," McShane shouted. One man kept running. The other stopped and turned, leveling a revolver.
 McShane shot first, fatally wounding the gunman. McShane fired twice more, possibly wounding the other man. They had just robbed the grocer and his latest customer of $400. The score: One man dead, one captured, one escaped. McShane unscathed.

Promoted to Detective
 For his deed, McShane was promoted to detective. He was treated to a ham and egg sandwich in the office of Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia.
 Before he resigned from the police force in 1957 after 21 years service, he was a square-jawed former boxer. McShane won 12 citations for bravery. He also got busted once the was reinstated two weeks later for holding an umbrella over the head of a heavyweight champion Rocky Marciano. He says he thought the widely published photograph of his act was not in the best interest of the department's dignity.
 In recent days, however, McShane, has been enforcing the biggest law of them all—the U.S. Constitution. Now Chief U.S. Marshal, he has been in personal command of the blooded marshall, border patrolmen and federal corrections officers who with the first federal investigation of the University of Mississippi.

As usual, McShane was in the thick of the battle and in the thick of controversy.
 "Trigger Violence," Mississippi officials charged that his marshall fired the first tear gas, triggering the violence. Federal officials said the marshall died until attacked by the mob and commended them for not using their tear gas despite the ferocity of the fight.
 Before Mississippi, McShane had been a New York fugitive spy Dr. Robert Soblen from Israel took to the United States and the prison sentence. Soblen thwarted his return by stabbing himself with a concealed steak knife. He later took a massive dose of drugs in a London hospital and died. Soblen was being flown back in an Israeli plane and was not to be in McShane's custody until it reached New York.

McShane was not blamed for Soblen's suicide attempt. Association With Brothers
 Always a ball fellow well met, McShane succeeded to his chief marshall's spot after a close association with Robert as an investigator for the Senate racket committee (the attorney general then was chief counsel for the committee) and with John as a security guard during the 1960 presidential campaign.
 President Kennedy named McShane marshall for the District of Columbia soon after he took office and upgraded him to chief marshall later.
 James Joseph Patrick McShane was born on St. Patrick's Day, 1909, in the shadow of New York's Polo Grounds. He grew up on New York's east side and was an electrical repairman before becoming a policeman at 27.
 He quit the force in 1934. Quick with his gun and his fists, McShane also had a quick wit. (One asked how he escaped in a shootout with some burglars, he explained: "I went to bobbing and weaving school.") A fellow detective described McShane as "charming," not "tough guy" type. U.S. marshals and their deputies are the enforcement officers for the federal court system. They are the process servers for federal courts and are in charge of prisoners in transit and executions.
 They are empowered to deputize whomever they need in performance of their duties.
 Marshals are the oldest of the law's most colorful arms, the first 13 having been appointed by George Washington in 1775. Their ranks have included such faded characters as Wyatt Earp and Doc Masterson. And James Joseph Patrick McShane.
