BBC Broadcasts
Unique Service
For Saving Lives
 By MARIS ROSS
 United Press International
 London — (UPI) — "Now here is special police message . . . And with that simple signal the giant British Broadcasting Corp. (BBC) almost every day, and sometimes several times a day, sets out to save a life, bring solace or succor to the dying or to help catch a criminal."
 It is one of the biggest and one of the most successful "SOS" services operating in the world today and it has been going on for 38 years on the BBC Home Service radio network.
 Starts Without Plan
 It started without plan one day when an official of the then fledgling BBC agreed to put a message on the air seeking the whereabouts of a relative of a very sick little boy. Records of the incident are hazy but it was the beginning of a unique and regular public service conducted by the state-financed British radio.
 Since that time the BBC has broadcast without charge thousands of messages bringing relatives quickly to the bedside of sick people. In cooperation with the police, it has put out thousands of appeals for witnesses of crimes and serious accidents, warnings against missing dangerous drugs, and SOS's for special equipment or medicine to treat rare diseases.
 Anyone may phone up the BBC and ask them to send out a message for someone certified dangerously ill. Police verification must be had, and the patient must be asking to see the relative.
 "The last condition is important," said a BBC spokesman. "Many years ago we requested a man's wife to go to his bedside.
 Not Too Ill
 "The SOS had come from a doctor who certified that the patient was dangerously ill. He was not, however, too ill to write to us when he heard of the broadcast to say if his wife dared to come near him, he would kick her out."
 The spokesman added: "It is hard to refuse some requests, especially those made by people who, having just come from a deathbed, want to find relatives for the funeral. But we cannot help them as we never broadcast when death has occurred."
 "A number of visitors, often wives whose husbands have left them or vice versa, call at Broadcasting House. But we do not broadcast for missing people except at the request of the police in cases of crime or suspected crime."
 "Some of our callers weep when we refuse. Others become extremely indignant and ask what they are paying for their radio license money for. (British radio and television users pay annual fees for each set. It is this money that finances the BBC operation.)
Broadcast Warnings
 Explaining the service further, the BBC spokesman said:
 "We broadcast warnings to prevent people from drinking poison given to them by a chemist (druggist). In mistakes for something else; calls for the return of lost drugs; police messages that might help in tracing murderers and escaped lunatics, and the less sensational appeal for witnesses of accidents that are almost a daily item of our programs."
 "Many people write most grateful letters over the SOS messages for relatives. One man wrote us: "I have always regarded the BBC as a huge machine operating like an automaton, and it has filled my heart with gladness to find myself greatly disillusioned."

Morse Says Cuban Action Within Law
 Washington — Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) said Wednesday the Cuban "quarantine" falls within the framework of international law.
 Morse, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's subcommittee on Latin American Affairs, made the statement after a four-hour State Department briefing.
 The action was "necessary to protect the security of the Western Hemisphere," Morse said.
 Morse singled out for praise Secretary of State Dean Rusk and Ambassador deLesseps Morrison, ambassador to the council of the Organization of American States.
 He said the two men showed their leadership in winning unanimous council action supporting President Kennedy's stand on Cuba.
