Hospital Hospitality

They've flung the "No Visitors" sign away. You're convalescent, and so today Your friends and kin will be in to spread Bright rays of cheer round your hospital bed.

And they come in coveys, their greetings hearty. The room soon sounds like a cocktail party. There's Tim telling jokes to Beth and Sue. You can't hear the stories, for Jack and Lew Are drowning them out with yak about golf. So somebody carries your ash tray off, And your water tumbler soon follows after, Which nobody notes, with the talk and laughter.

For cheer is spread like a taxpayer's gold, Though a medicine dropper wouldn't hold What's aimed at the bed and the wallflower in it, Who's feeling seedier by the minute!

—Georgie Starbuck Galbraith

A young lady was taking a driving lesson and was doing very well until she came to a traffic light and stopped abruptly.

"Why did you do that?" the instructor asked. "You have the green light."

"But what about him?" the girl said, nodding toward a U. S. mail truck approaching on the intersecting street. "He'll stop at the red light, of course," the instructor said impatiently.

The girl sighed in relief and started forward. "I wasn't sure," she explained. "If neither snow, nor rain, nor heat, nor gloom of night can stop him, what's a little old red light?"

"Wait out here—you're only in the way when I buy you a suit."

The neighbors sadly attended funeral services for the man down the block who had stepped off a curb and been fatally injured by a passing car.

"It's his wife I feel sorry for," said one mourner. "Still quite young and with three children."

"Well," said the neighborhood philosopher, "what could she expect? She knew he was a pedestrian when she married him."

—Frances Benson

The college youth had received his first assignment in his literature course and paid a rare visit to the library.

"I want a Shakespeare book," he said.

"Well, which one?" the librarian asked.

"William!" the youth shot back.

—Barbara-Jean Yonck

The wife of a television announcer put her son to bed and told him: "Now, don't forget to say your prayers."

"Oh, Lord," the little boy mumbled, "please bless Mommy and Daddy, and give us this day our slow-baked, oven-fresh, vitamin-enriched bread."
