

Candidate Lauds Hard Line in Cuba

U. S. determination to draw a hard line in Cuba is paying dividends, but "we must now prepare ourselves for pressures as great or even greater from sources such as Berlin," State Representative Carl Fisher (R-Eugene), said today in Medford.

Chamber of Commerce roundtable, Fisher complained that until President Kennedy took a firm stand in Cuba "the American people had little about which to be proud in our conduct of foreign affairs."

"We have not acted firmly and decisively in such areas as the Congo, Laos, Berlin and in our relations with Red China. Now we can again hold our heads high," he said, adding, "However, we may have very little time in which to feel the satisfaction which is ours today."

Addressing the Medford Chamber of Commerce roundtable, Fisher complained that until President Kennedy took a firm stand in Cuba "the American people had little about which to be proud in our conduct of foreign affairs."

What do these movements last week mean to us? What might be the economic-financial impact in the U. S. of the Cuban crisis?

Our economy has been advancing at a sluggish, highly disappointing pace for months. Our unemployment rate has remained stickily high at close to 6 per cent throughout this entire expansion. In thousands of plants in industries from coast to coast, there is idle capacity to produce. There are no shortages of anything. The stock market cracked wide open last spring, and since then a disenchanting public has moved to the sidelines in massive numbers.

Prices of basic raw materials and prices of goods at the factory level have stuck in a remarkably narrow range for years, and recently these prices have been weakening. The low profit margins of an increasing total of U. S. corporations are now of deep concern to the government as well as to businessmen. About the only force pushing up the cost of living has been the continued rise in the cost of services. The pace of wage hikes has slowed markedly too. Consumers have been buying, but not avidly; business in the U. S. economy—nor is there the oomph that gives equipment, but not enough more to give economy a forward push.

There has not been for months and there is not now inflation in the U. S. economy—nor is there the oomph that gives a country a "feeling" of prosperity, of well-being.

It is against this background that President Kennedy has taken our calculated risks in Cuba. There is simply no parallel between this economic pattern and the background which existed when the Korean conflict broke out. Now our aim is to strengthen the price picture, to improve corporate profits, to encourage more spending and borrowing. In the early 1950s, the aim was to control our pent-up demands for goods, to keep the lid on prices, to curb wartime profits. The sort of buying expansion that would have been economically catastrophic when Korea occurred would be welcome as economically stimulating today.

Also imperative to any intelligent appraisal of what might happen are some assumptions on where this showdown might lead. Specifically: Assumption No. 1: The showdown stops at the quarantine, and while we go through an indefinite period of a war of nerves nothing worse than this occurs.

Under these circumstances, the Cuban crisis could be a modest "plus." It has united the nation. It has perked up world commodity prices and this is all to the good. Any additional spending on mobilization and defense that a quarantine would involve would be mildly helpful to the economy and certainly not inflationary.

As for the stock market, despite its excellent performance during most of Wednesday and its sensational comeback at the close, it is in for some rough weeks—and would have been, no matter what the Cuban situation. This is the period when selling to take losses for tax purposes always is a depressing influence, and with millions of investors sitting with big losses after this year's slumps, tax selling before 1962 ends will be particularly heavy. The break in the market this spring and adverse publicity about the mutual fund records have slashed into public buying of mutual fund shares—and not only have the giant funds cut their buying of stocks but many also are becoming net sellers.

The lower prices fall under liquidation by frightened amateurs, the better will be the bargains available in the stock market. But the bargains will be bought by the cold-blooded professionals. The public won't return until after prices have gone way back up again.

If the outcome is assumption No. 1, we still will need large-scale, across-the-board tax reductions—and as soon as Congress can possibly vote them—to get our economy off this plateau and back into a major, strong expansion to full prosperity.

Assumption No. 2: The U. S. invades Cuba. Under these circumstances, there surely would be a significant increase in spending for mobilization and defense and a resulting spur to our economy. But with goods in ample supply, production well below capacity, unemployment far too high, the hike in spending would not send us into another inflationary phase.

As for the stock market, it still would be subject to the influences outlined above for the time being anyway—and right now these influences are more powerful than the good earnings reports being issued by many leading corporations, the fact that hundreds of blue-chip stocks have been battered down to attractive prices and that earnings-price relationships are more "normal" than in years.

If the outcome is assumption No. 2, then across-the-board top-to-bottom tax reduction will continue essential to give our economy new incentives and thereby to accelerate our growth.

They'll Do It Every Time

Diverticulosis

I get hundreds of letters from people who say that they went to a doctor complaining of all sorts of nervous discomforts, such as headaches, back aches, and perhaps a pain in the chest.

The doctor put the patient into a hospital and gave him a thorough examination, and all that the X-ray man could come up with was that the man had a few tiny pouches as big as beans, on the sides of his large bowel. The doctor then said, "There's your trouble; you have chronic diverticulitis."

Actually, in all my 35 years working around universities—going to see several autopsies a week, I never saw a case of what I would call chronic diverticulitis, and I rarely saw a case of acute diverticulitis.

The ending "itis" means inflammation. Actually, with a 40 per cent of people past 50 have diverticulosis, a condition in which there are many of the little pouches which usually constitute a harmless accompaniment of aging—about as harmless as gray hair.

For 50 years the medical profession very properly ignored it, but recently it has become the fashionable disease; it takes the place of "chronic appendicitis" which used to be so fashionable. I myself have some diverticula which do not produce any symptoms. It would never occur to me to go on a diet or to have an operation, just because of them. It is a remarkable fact that only rarely does one of the little pouches get inflamed or so inflamed that it punches through (perforates) and causes the patient to get a localized peritonitis.

Next Diagnosis Awaited I am happy to say that of late I have been seeing signs that doctors are getting tired of this fashionable diagnosis of diverticulitis. Now I am interested to see what the next fancy diagnosis will be. There always must be one such "disease" with which very busy doctors can quickly satisfy and please, and get out of their office those millions of nervous women who only get angry if told that all they have is "nerves."

Men patients sometimes must also be pleased with this sort of fashionable diagnosis. I recently saw a man whose liver is beginning to growl because he drinks a fifth of whiskey every evening. He is delighted with his new doctor who has been tactful enough to tell him that his troubles are all due to his "hormones." As the man says, this new doctor is a real scientist. "The other darn fools!" all said his troubles were due to chronic alcoholism.

Another fashionable diagnosis which finally appears now to be losing its great popularity is hiatus hernia. During my 25 years at the Mayo Clinic, I never saw a single case of hiatus hernia in which I recommended an operation. Usually, I thought either that the symptoms of the patient were not those of a hiatus hernia, or the symptoms were so mild that no sensible person would want to undergo a large and risky operation to get rid of them. In some cases in which the patient had a lot of fat in his abdomen, when I got him to reduce weight, the symptoms disappeared.

Diarrhea in Tourists As I said in a recent column, hundreds of thousands of tourists arriving in a strange land, promptly come down with a violent diarrhea. Most of them soon get over it; only a few have an uncomfortable bowel for some time afterward. For years the cause was thought to be a tiny single-celled parasite called an ameba, but recent studies have shown that only rarely is the traveler's acute diarrhea due to amebiasis. Also, the drug usually taken by tourists to avoid or cure amebiasis does not seem to have any effect on the diarrhea. Some studies which showed that the giving to travelers of an antibiotic would cut down on the incidence of the trouble indicated that the cause is a germ, but the brevity of many a spell, with the lack of any fever or abdominal pain or subsequent soreness suggests that the cause is a virus that acts on the nervous system of the bowel.

Recent careful studies made partly at the University of Mexico, showed that a m o n g North American students who went to Mexico, diarrhea occurred in from 25 to 35 per cent, and almost always within 10 days after arrival. It usually lasted from one to three days and failed to leave any signs of injury to the bowel. For this study stools passed by the students were quickly frozen and then flown to New York laboratories for virus studies. No particular virus could be incriminated.

The fact that going to the tropics is not necessarily harmful was shown by a study of some groups of visitors to Hawaii. Among them the incidence of diarrhea was only 7.6 per cent. Of a group of U. S. students who spent a summer vacation in Europe, about half had an attack of
