Doctor Treats Injured Woman Then Writes Check

It is normal for the patient to give the doctor money, but not for the doctor to give the patient money. But this is what happened recently in a local hospital.

A woman was seriously injured in an auto accident while returning with her husband from a hunting trip. A young out-of-state doctor and his wife driving north had been stopped to give aid.

After administering first aid the doctor followed the ambulance to the hospital, performed emergency work while waiting for a local doctor to arrive, then assisted him.

The hospital administrator asked him before he left if he had been paid.

The young doctor replied, "No, but they don't have anything. I would like to borrow a pen, however."

Thinking he might leave a bill for his services, the administrator loaned him a pen. Then the doctor wrote out a check for $50 and asked that it be given the patient after the doctor left.

Try and Stop Me

By BENNETT CERF

SYDIA KAYE tells of a Palm Springs matron who has her desert mansion redecored every winter. The precise shade that each room is to be painted is an obsession with her. Last fall she covered with the exact colors she wanted and left them for the painters to match.

When the job was finished, the painters had done such a faithful job, that the gratified matron gave them a substantial bonus. "Best painters I've ever found," she enthused. They departed without telling her that they had made numerous mistakes, but had carefully covered them up by repainting the ping-pong paddles to match the walls.

"Nails" Flanagan's wife turned up for the first time in months to see him on visitors' day at a federal penitentiary. "Nails," she said earnestly, "you been in this jail now for two full years and the children are starting to ask questions." "Yeah?" mumbled Nails suspiciously. "What kind of stuff do you want to know?" "Mainly," said Mrs. Flanagan, "where you stashed the loot."

A golfing pal of Peter Lind Hayes confides that his wife uses gunpowder on her face instead of talcum powder. "And that," he concludes, "is why she always looks half shot."
