Some Conditions Hard to Cure

Many people write me asking if there isn't someone, somewhere, who can cure an inherited nervous condition they have, such as Huntington's chorea, or amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or an inherited chemical defect, such as diabetes, gout, or pernicious anemia. Sadly, I have to say, no, I know of no complete cure, and I do not expect soon to see one. Why? Because in so many ways the inherited conditions are like the mutations which show up at intervals in many forms of life. In such conditions, the person is born without a needed chemical or with a poorly constructed organ like a pancreas or kidney. Unfortunately, we doctors cannot hope to rebuild a defective organ.

Alvarez

To show what I mean: Charles Darwin once told about a farmer who went out one morning and found that a ewe in his flock had given birth to some strange-looking lambs that had little short legs, like those of a dachshund. These lambs represented a new variety of sheep, and the farmer chose to breed a number of them because they could not jump over fences, as his normal sheep could do.

Similarly, from time to time on a mink ranch, a female of the wild brown variety will give birth to a little mink whose fur may be a rich dark color. The rancher will then breed for this color because the skins are likely to have a much greater value than do the skins of the wild animal. I have read that all of the many varieties of dog we have today were bred by men from two wild dog-like animals — the jackal and the wolf.

Would Ask Veterinary

The point that I am making here is that if a dog-breeder were to see one of his animals with a scabby mange due to a bacterium or a mold, he would ask his veterinary to clean it up with some medicine, but when a mutant shows up — perhaps a strange, beautiful and unusual puppy that is likely to take a prize at the annual dog show — the breeder will not think of asking his veterinarian to "cure" it; he will know it is just a different variety of dog, and he will quickly breed many more dogs like it.

As I said, in many ways the hereditary difficulties that plague so many of us behave like mutations. Every so often in times past, a new variety of man would appear in a certain family — perhaps a variety lacking some necessary chemical that does something important in the normal body. For instance, in infants with "galactosemia" the child lacks the ferment which enables its body to handle sugar of milk, and in phenylketonuria the child lacks the ferment that enables it to handle a substance called phenylalanine.

Every year now new diseases of this type are being discovered. If a number of infants with one of these defects were to grow up and get married to persons with the same defect, we might soon have a new variety of the human race, in which most of the infants born would have the peculiar chemical defect.

Because chemists have been able to supply diabetics with insulin, gouty persons with colchicine, and people with pernicious anemia with B-12 — all of them substances that the persons need if they are to stay well or perhaps alive — I have hope that with time, research workers will find more and more of the chemicals that are needed to keep alive and well the people who are born with a defect in nerves, muscles, tendons, joints, skin or other organs.

Substitution Possible

Now that chemists are learning so much about the special nucleic acids that make up our genes — the tiny units that preside over making the ferments that we so greatly need in our bodies — it is conceivable that someday a good gene will be substituted for a defective one, and then perhaps a person with diabetes can be cured so well that none of his descendants will ever get the disease. Perhaps a man with Huntington's chorea will be supplied with a chemical that will keep his nerves from being slowly destroyed.

Strange to say, as I wrote this, I opened a journal and read that in the case of a hybrid wheat which was unsatisfactory because the male plants were sterile, scientists have just found the "missing link" gene, which restores fertility to the hybrid, and increases its yield!

Among the troublesome and crippling diseases about which doctors know little of the cause is Arthritis. Dr. Alvarez has prepared a little booklet about it which will help sufferers to better understand the problems. You may obtain it by sending 25 cents and a self-addressed, stamped envelope with your request for "Arthritis and Rheumatism," to Dr. Walter C. Alvarez, Dept. MMT, The Register and Tribune Syndicate, Box 957, Des Moines 4, Iowa.

THEY'RE MAKING a movie of Charles Finney's fascinating, off-beat book called "The Circus of Dr. Lao." The good doctor was an authentic wizard in his spare time and his sideshow included several celebrated bigshots from mythology. One of them was Medusa, and the customers were solemnly warned not to look her in the eye, lest they be turned to stones.

A lady from Iowa ignored the injunction one day and was promptly transformed as advertised. Her husband, properly disturbed, started to drag her out of the sideshow tent when an attendant rushed up and bawled, "Hey, you can't take that statue out of here."

To which, naturally, the husband replied angrily, "That ain't no statue. That's my wife!"

Musa Won't Favor Joint Committee

Salem —UPI— State Sen. Ben Musa (D-The Dalles) said Saturday he does not favor a joint Senate-House committee on constitutional revision in the 1963 legislature.

His opinion is significant because he is certain to be the 1963 Senate president. Musa said he might change his mind, but only if a majority of both the Senate and House favored a joint committee.

Teenagers Cited For Smoking In Public

Two Medford boys and a girl from 16 to 17 years old were cited by Medford police Friday for violation of a city ordinance — juveniles smoking.

A 16-year-old boy and a 17-year-old boy were cited at J st. near 12th st., Medford, after an officer observed them smoking.

The girl was cited at the Oakdale Market, 415 South Oakdale ave, after an officer observed her smoking outside the store.

CALL OF THE WILD

Scarborough, Eng. — (UPI) — David Smith, 9, left a note for his parents Saturday: "I am running away. Have fun," then picked up his fishing rod and left home. David's father found him Sunday in this port city, 40 miles from home, fishing happily from a dock. Alongside him were a recently caught cod, whitefish and an eel.
