Famed Old 999 Formally Given Chicago Museum

Chicago—UPI—She was a true iron racehorse of the rails. Tall and lean, intended for speed from the tip of her long, painted cowcatcher to the end of her gleaming tender, she took a chance—and achieved something never achieved before.

It was 1893. America was just becoming speed conscious. New York Central Railroad officials, in an age of great railroad rivalry, were out to build the world's fastest locomotive.

They came up with a standard eight-wheeler type but with unusually large driving wheels for high-speed running. She was given the number, 999, and then on May 10, 1893, she was given her chance.

She was allowed to run full throttle over a straight 36-mile stretch of track, just west of Batavia, N. Y. No one, not even her designers, knew what she could do and the platform was crowded with reporters and railroad officials as the train pulled out.

Inch by inch, the throttle came back as the engineer gave 999 her head. Faster and faster, the tail driving wheels began to spin.

Stop watches came out. A mile clicked by in 40 seconds—another in 38 seconds—and finally, on the 31.2 seconds! 112 1/2 miles an hour! No train or locomotive had ever moved so fast.

Overnight, 999 became the most famous locomotive in the world and it would be a decade before another matched her record.

At World's Fair
999 drew awe-struck admiration throughout the remainder of the year at the World's Fair in Chicago. She later toured the country and became the greatest single attraction in railroading. Millions viewed her.

Now, after a long and eventful train-pulling career, 999 has returned here to stay. In formally presenting the old steam horse to the Chicago Museum of Science and Industry, Alfred E. Perlman, president of the Central, looked back—then ahead.

"Who can say?" he asserted. "Maybe in a few decades, one of our diesel will be on display next to 999, having been technically surpassed by a revolutionary new motive power—possibly atomic energy."

"Maybe not so long from now, a new generation will grow up in an age of super trains, moving at average speeds greater than 999's record, needing to be refueled every ten years or so, and transporting men and material without the aid of human hands."

Iceland Ponders Over Question Of Having TV

By JIM BREETVELD
Reykjavik, Iceland—UPI—"TV or not TV," that is the question for Iceland today. When most countries are discussing what programs should be produced on TV, Icelanders are pondering whether or not they should have television at all.

The issue has nothing to do with backwardness or underdevelopment, because the tiny island republic of Iceland is a giant in the world of culture. She became the first country to wipe out illiteracy and she achieved this 60 years ago.

The Icelandic civilization flourished during the Dark Ages when most nations were groping about for the fragments of European life, submerged in mass fear, poverty and ignorance.

Trial By Jury
Long before trial by jury was a reality in Britain, the early Viking settlers of the North Atlantic island were practicing a crude version of the democratic process of justice. The Icelandic Parliament, the Althing, is the oldest existing legislative body in the world, having been founded in 930 A. D. It still rules Iceland.

Icelanders speak Icelandic, the oldest and purest modern language in Europe. It was spoken throughout Scandinavia in Viking times. Icelandic literature, the only Scandinavian literature to flower in medieval times, helped to preserve the tongue in its purest form. It has changed so little in a thousand years that modern Icelanders can generally read and understand ancient literary works like the Eddas and the Sagas of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries in the original. Most Icelanders also speak Danish and English, which they study in school as foreign languages.

Book-Loving
In keeping with the strong literary tradition of Iceland, there are a large number of novelists, poets and playwrights creating for the book-loving countrymen. Many of them receive direct government financial assistance. The most prominent writer in Iceland today is Halldor Laxness, whose novels of rural Icelandic life won for him the 1955 Nobel Prize for Literature.

Like Iceland has its drawbacks, too. In the Iceland National Theater's production of the musical "My Fair Lady," the producers had to create an Icelandic dialect to serve as "cockney" in the show. Icelandic does not have any dialects of its own. When the song "I could Have Danced All Night" caused considerable giggling and giggling in the audience, it was understandable. The winter night in Iceland is 20 hours long.

Statistics Show High Illiteracy Rate in India

New Delhi—UPI—As many as 335 million of India's total population do not know how to read or write.

This was revealed by Census Commissioner A. K. Mirra, who recently announced the final total of the 1961 head-count as 439,235,462 persons, including 226,293,620 males and 212,941,842 females.

Of these, he said only 77,828,162 men and 27,503,118 women are literate.

Mirra gave the following additional information: The best educated of India's 15 states is the communist stronghold of Kerala where 50 per cent of the people are literate. The literacy ratio between men and women is 60/40.

—Another strongly communist state, West Bengal, ranks second with 30 per cent.

The most thickly populated state is Prime Minister Nehru's home province of Uttar Pradesh. But here, only 1/6 of the people are literate. Most backward states educationally are disputed Kashmir and Jammu and the former princely state of Rajasthan. Less than 1/7 of the population can read or write in these regions.

Mirra said India's population had increased by about 21 per cent in the past 10 years. He warned that serious danger was in the offing if this "phenomenal" increase was not checked.

He said population was growing because of "elimination of famines, epidemics and wasting diseases like malaria."

The commissioner placed India's average life expectancy at 45. Under the British regime it was 32.

He said the statistics indicate girls in the first few years of life suffer from greater neglect than boys.

A heavy toll of female lives is still taken in the earlier reproductive ages (15-34), he said.

Mirra said: "On the assumption of a round figure of 3,000 millions as the population of the world in 1961, and an inhabited land area of 135.6 million square kilometers, India accounted for about 2.4 per cent of the world's land but 16.6 per cent of the world's population."

"In population, India is second in the world only to China."
