Atomic Energy Now Helping To Solve Murder Mysteries

Washington — Atomic energy is now solving murder mysteries. For example, an all but invisible smear of grease on a victim's clothing might be shown to be identical with grease on the killer's car. Constituents of hair, blood, fingernails, and clothing can be used to provide positive identification of a substance to other spirits.

The Atomic Energy Commission and a number of private companies, including General Dynamics Corp. of San Diego and Technical Measurement Corp. of North Haven, Conn., are developing means of identifying criminals by means of tell tale radiations.

One of the new tools is called neutron activation analysis. It can identify bits of evidence thousands of times too tiny for detection by any other method.

According to General Dynamics, the FBI and many police laboratories are interested in the new identification system. The Internal Revenue Service and Narcotics Bureau already are using other atomic sleuths in their work.

Material to be analyzed is placed in an atomic reactor and subjected to high-intensity bombardment by neutrons. This makes it radioactive, and the rays emitted tell the scientist what the material is.

Gun powder residues from the hand of a person who has recently fired a pistol are easily detected by this method. General Dynamics said traces of gun powder as small as 10 billionths of a gram "have been exposed, identified, and measured" this way.

The Technical Measurement Corp. said bits of dust almost vanishingly small can be identified as having come from a room where a murder was committed.

By neutron activation analysis, Canadian police matched a single strand of hair clutched in a murdered girl's hand with the hair on an accused man's head. The man was convicted.

Study Napoleon's Hair. Similarly, Scottish Scientists who examined a relic of Napoleon's hair discovered he had been given arsenic—possibly in medicine administered during his last illness—which may have contributed to his death.
