

Kenya May Be Next Nation To Exclude Senator Ellender

Press Conference Statement Irks African Leaders

Nairobi, Kenya — (UPI) — Political leader Tom Mboya said today he would ask the government to make Kenya the third African nation to exclude Sen. Allen J. Ellender (D-La.).

Ellender was scheduled to lunch today with Jomo Kenyatta, once jailed by the British as a Mau Mau terrorist and now leader of the Kenya African National Union.

The senator arrived at Dar-es-Salaam airport in Tanganyika for a stopover Tuesday, only to learn he had been banned from entering the country. Monday he was banned from Uganda.

All the actions were taken because Ellender told a news conference in Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, last week that "the average African is incapable of leadership except through the assistance of Europeans."

In Washington, the State Department issued a statement saying Ellender's views were his own. It said the American government "has repeatedly demonstrated its support for the aspirations of the peoples and governments of Africa."

The State Department has received reports from U.S. embassies all over the African continent relaying the objections of African officials to Ellender's remarks. One U.S. post wired that the senator's African tour was undoing months of patient diplomacy.

Supports Apartheid Policy
Ellender also told the Salisbury press conference he supported the apartheid policy of strict racial segregation in South Africa and favored the white-dominated federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Mboya, secretary general of KANU and labor minister of Kenya, said he had sent President Kennedy the following cable:

"KANU wishes to express most strongly its disgust and disappointment at the deliberate provocation of the African people by Sen. Ellender in his Salisbury statement. His apparent sympathies for Federal Rhodesian Premier Sir Roy Welensky and apartheid will reflect on your country's position in the minds of many Africans. He has done much harm to Afro-American relations.

Mboya also said "Ellender is not welcome here with his dirty creed."

Diving Experiment Said Successful Despite Deaths

Long Beach, Calif. — (UPI) — Swiss scientist, showing no ill effects from the deep sea dive that claimed the lives of two of his companions, prepared today to dismantle his equipment and return to Europe.

But Hannes Keller, 28, said the experiment was a scientific success despite the deaths of his assistants.

Peter Small, 35, a British journalist and veteran diver, died as a result of the experiment Monday to test a secret gas that keeps divers from getting the bends. A safety diver, Christopher Duncan Whittaker, 21, failed to check the bell in which Small and Keller were ascending from 1,000 feet.

The coroner said at the time that Small apparently suffered an air embolism in his blood stream, an indication of the bends during which nitrogen bubbles explode in the blood due to external pressure and lack of oxygen.

However, Keller and a medical officer with the project said Tuesday Small died of a cardiac fatigued arrest.

"This is something that can happen in a climbing mountain," Keller said. "It can happen in any sport. It can happen at any time, to anyone."

"He died of fatigue and strain because of cardiac fatigued arrest," said Dr. Albert A. Buehlmann, professor at the University of Zurich. "He had none of the signs of a diving accident. His lungs were dry."

Disobeyed Order
Whittaker, a UCLA geology student from London, had been ordered not to descend a second time because he showed signs of fatigue. But the enthusiastic frogman apparently disobeyed the order and returned to aid another safety diver.

Dick Anderson, 30, Los Angeles, the second diver, said he sent Whittaker back to the surface from 200 feet. The young Englishman never made it. It is presumed his body, weighted down with a lead diving belt, will not be found.

Keller said he intends to continue with his diving work although he discontinued the experiment here.

Anti-Discrimination Housing Rules Announced

Washington — (UPI) — The government has adopted a comparatively tough set of rules for applying President Kennedy's anti-discrimination order to public housing and urban renewal projects.

The rules, announced Tuesday, appear to contemplate closer application of the order where direct federal subsidy is involved than where government assistance takes the form of mortgage insurance.

For example: —When a city sells land in an urban renewal project to a private developer, it must attach a perpetual covenant prohibiting future discrimination in sale, rental or use of the property.

Project Can Be Seized
—A public housing project, operated in violation of anti-discrimination clauses in the federal aid contract, can be seized and operated by the government. These projects normally are owned by local housing authorities.

Privately owned facilities in an urban renewal project, such as a lunch counter or barber shop, must be open to all project residents without discrimination.

This would apply also to public facilities, such as schools and parks, outside the project if their construction by the city were counted towards the community's one-third contribution to the project. Again, however, the non-discrimination requirement would apply only to project residents. The federal government pays two-thirds of the net cost to the city of an urban renewal venture.

An exception to this "facilities" rule would be granted, according to William L. Slayton, head of the Urban Renewal Administration, if the city showed that "the facility is either city-wide in character or not necessary to provide convenience goods and services" to project residents.

The executive order is binding only for projects on which final local-federal contracts were entered into after Nov. 20, the date Kennedy signed the executive order.

Neither side would comment immediately on the prospects for a recount. At stake was the $26,000 a year presidency of the local, numerous other union posts and control of a $5 million treasury, one of the richest local union treasuries anywhere.

rule and no benefits for members.

Richards, who headed the rebel Chicago Musicians for Union Democracy, charged Petrillo stood for "one-man
