

Small Worlds Around Us

By LYNN M. WATKINS

(Register and Tribune Syndicate 1962)

The Mysterious Case of the Hidden Beeps and Cheeps

Every neighbor in the block who knew about it, and most of them did, had an opinion. Many of them suddenly became "experts," claiming to know all about beeps and cheeps. In the meantime the beeps and scratches continued in a downspout on the house at the corner. All day long the noise persisted. It had been present for a couple of weeks.

Some of the "experts" tried to explain the noises by the presence of a group of starlings on the rooftop, near the upper end of the downspout. Where the "experts" fell down, however, was attempting to explain why the beeps in the spout continued after the rooftop birds were frightened away.

The consensus of all concerned was that something alive was in the downspout. All the folks did a great deal of intense listening, some with their ears pressed against the metal of the downspout. Even long periods of listening, however, proved little as the beeps were always muffled. The spout itself acted as a sounding board, telegraphing the noise throughout its entire length. The exact location of the noise just couldn't be pinpointed.

Dismantling Began

After days of discussion and listening the homeowner and the interested neighbors decided the downspout had to be removed to the outside. The work of dismantling began. The pounding and the nail pulling quieted the noise from within the metal pipe.

The usually present starlings left the rooftop and took up positions in nearby trees and on convenient telephone wires to watch the proceedings. In fact, now that some of the neighbors look back on the happenings of that day they recall the fact that the birds in the trees and on the wires seemed exceedingly interested in what was going on.

At last the downspout was disconnected at the level of the eaves. The brackets that had held it vertical with the side of the house were loosened and the long length of pipe laid on the ground. Out from the pipe end scrambled a startling. A man grabbed the bird and held it firmly in his hand. He, along with the others, examined the length of pipe.

Mass of Material

A couple of feet from what was the upper end of the downspout was a mass of small sticks, strips of paper and rags, several long grass roots and leaves occupying at least a foot and a half of the pipe. On the top of this mass of material the captive starling had lived for at least a couple of weeks. The man holding the starling examined the bird. It was an adult and very plump.

The conclusion seemed obvious even to the most skeptical, who for the first time in their lives were witnessing an indication of animal intelligence. The bird had somehow slipped into the downspout and could not escape. The other starlings had obviously been feeding the captive, keeping him alive.

Some of the "experts" in attendance held to another theory. They claimed the outside birds had also been carrying material and dropping it in the spout in order to build the platform high enough for the captive to crawl out. The skeptical of this is impossible. Others, probably equally intelligent, say a thing may be easily true but at the same time unbelievable.
