Proper Preparation For Examinations Produces Results

By DAVID NYDICK
UPI Education Specialist

As examination time approaches many high school and college students will be spending long hours preparing for these tests. Although they are consistently advised not to wait until the last minute, this practice continues.

Perhaps, last minute study is not always the result of neglect. Much of this is valuable review. Since most exams require a great deal of specific knowledge, going over facts is quite important.

Techniques Vary

Effective study techniques vary with individuals. Some prefer long study sessions with relatively long rest periods. Others may desire short study sessions with short breaks for relaxation. Unfortunately, short study sessions with long rest periods are not the answer. Parents should encourage the student to use the method best suited for his needs. Make sure that a quiet, well lighted area in the home is available. The pressure of unrelated responsibilities should be removed. This will permit the student to concentrate in a relaxed atmosphere.

The actual studying should be well organized. Careful planning will save time and produce superior results. A study schedule should be written down, thus making sure that sufficient time is available for each subject. Since such estimates may be inaccurate, extra time should be included. Such a plan needs a few free times for entertainment. Naturally, this will depend upon the number of days or weeks covered by the schedule.

Materials Available

There are many methods and materials available for reviewing. The first step is clarification of the aims and general areas covered by the course. Very often, a course outline has been distributed.

A good set of notes taken during lectures is most valuable. A teacher will probably discuss those points which he considers most important. Of course, many of these will be included in an exam. A student should go over the notes, carefully checking items which have been emphasized.

In many cases, students have been given printed material covering specific topics. These should be closely studied. They are obviously considered important by the teacher.

Textbooks are major parts of most courses. Naturally, they should have been read throughout the term. The book should be reviewed to make sure there is an understanding of the major points. A good method is to make notes in an outline form. Items which have been written in a student's own words are easily remembered. This technique can be used throughout the year. The notes will then be available for these important study times. This avoids the need to re-read the entire book.

Review Books Available

Commercially prepared review books are available for a variety of high school and college courses.

These are not printed for the course as given by an individual teacher. They can be valuable as concise reviews of particular topics. The teacher can usually advise as to their value for his specific course. The materials assigned by the teacher and a student's notes are more directly related to the course.

Study for exams should be well organized. The time spent in planning will pay off in efficiency and results.

Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn W. Watkins

(Register & Tribune Syndicate, 1963)

Baby Hummingbirds Are Tied to 'Mother's Apron'

The small object you might sometime see on a tree branch that closely resembles a knot may not be a knot at all – it could be the nest of the ruby throated hummingbird. The knot that is not a knot will be about the size of half an English walnut shell.

It will look startlingly knotlike for the outside of the nest will be covered with lichens or some similar material that blends in perfectly with the tree bark. Usually it will be, if it is a nest and not a knot, about 10 or 15 feet above the ground. It will be about the most delicate "knot" you will ever see.

Because of their diminutive size few people ever are privileged to see a hummingbird's nest, but it's a worthwhile experience to find one and learn what a masterpiece of construction this smallest of American birds can create. Hummingbirds are never found in flocks, or even in small groups; seldom does an observer ever see over one or two in several days of searching. And the nests are even harder to see than is the bird itself, until the observer's eyes are trained to see what he is looking for. Then with diligence and patience the search is rewarded by the discovery of one or more of these tiny, jewel-like nests.

Strange Occurrence

To those careful observers who have searched out the nest of the ruby throats, and revisited the nest during the time the eggs are there and the little hummers present, a strange occurrence in bird behavior has been noted. This behavior was believed to be an accident rather than a plan, until it had been observed so many times, by so many observers, that its occurrence could not have been an accident. It is now recognized that the "supposed accident" is a habit trait, practiced by the parent birds, as a safety measure whereby the adults can leave the nest without worrying for fear the youngsters would fall out of the nest.

While the babies are small, it is often necessary for both parent birds to be away, gathering nectar from deep-throated flowers or picking up a few insects. For the babies, this parental absence would be the time of great danger, but there was a wise provision made for just such an eventuality. Nesting material comes in handy for other purposes aside from structure or nest lining.

All those serious students who have closely examined the nests of the ruby throated hummingbird are amazed at the perfection of the tiny nest, as well as the material that goes into it. Yards and yards of spider web; hundreds of fine, short and long plant rootlets (hair roots they are called), and down from various flowers, selected for its softness and fineness of texture, are used. The outside of this gem of nests is covered with gray lichens.

The eggs, white and usually two in number, are shaped like eggs but are no larger in bulk than an aspirin tablet. From these tiny eggs are hatched the very smallest of birds, similar in size to a baby honeybee. They rest on a bed of softest materials; in the nest they are barely a half inch below the upper rim of the nest. So small and light are the babies a strong wind can dislodge them or even a sudden jar of the tree limb can spill them to the ground.

But mother and father hummer have a plan, a clever plan. They tie the baby in; they loop a few strands of spider web about the youngster's leg so he cannot fall. With a silken cord the baby hummingbirds are secured to "mother's apron."
