A Twisted Spine
 One of the terrible problems facing many parents is that of the child, usually a girl, who is not a yet known starts to get a badly twisted back. Often it looks as if the muscles on one side were pulling the spine over. The question then arises, "What can be done?" Often, we physicians have done nothing, because we knew that even a big operation might not straighten up the girl and make her happy. I was just reading an article by Drs. J. William Fielding and Theodore Waugh of the New York Orthopedic Hospital which says that some surgeons put these girls first into a plaster cast, and later operate to fuse several vertebrae. Such fusing can serve to keep at least a part of the spine from getting more and more curved. Some surgeons use a special brace, and later they fuse the vertebrae; some, like Drs. Fielding and Waugh, believe in first fusing some vertebrae and then putting the child's chest into a plaster cast.

In some cases, the spine is fused with the help of two strips of bone taken from one of the bones in the leg. In other cases, the necessary bone is obtained from a "bone bank." When the plaster cast is applied, it is kept on usually for nine months. After three months in bed, the child is allowed to get up and move around. Usually from four to eight vertebrae are fused, and in most cases the work is done in two stages. An operation is deemed advisable if the spinal curve measures over 35 per cent. The two surgeons are frank in saying that the results have not always been satisfactory. The average maximum correction was 45 per cent of the curve as it existed when the child was first seen. Even after the operation, in some cases the child's spine kept curving in. Because of this the surgeons say that the "maintained correction" was 30 per cent of the curve as it was measured before the operations. Two other groups of orthopedists who have tried to keep twisted spines from curving further have reported similarly only partial results.

Psoarisis
 I was just reading the results of a statistical study of 392 patients with psoriasis, made by three teachers at Stanford Medical school, headed by Dr. Eugene M. Farber. Psoriasis is a chronic skin disease that attacks many persons; it causes red patches that appear on parts of the body—patches which are covered with tiny white scales. With treatment, perhaps with an ointment plus some radiation—perhaps ultra-violet—the patches can usually be cleared up, but there is a tendency for some of them to come back. Often a skin specialist has to try a number of treatments on an individual before he finds one that will work well. And later, when the patient comes back, he may have to find still another remedy.

It looks as if heredity must play a role in producing the trouble, but the disease can either skip generations or it may produce in some persons an illness different from the one here described. Dr. Farber found one family in which in each of four generations there were two or more persons with psoriasis. He pointed out that in some ways psoriasis resembles diabetes; they both can be made worse by nervous stress, by treatment with corticosteroids, by bacterial infection, by drinking alcoholic liquors and by gaining weight.

Of the 392 patients studied, 67.6 per cent first noted the coming of the skin disease between the ages of 10 and 40 years. There were, however, some patients who did not get the red spots until they were past 70. I think it hopeful that chemists are now analyzing the uninvolved skin and the diseased skin and are finding abnormalities in the red patches. Out of these studies may come a hint as to what went wrong and how it can be corrected.

Ignited by Lightning
 Early fires were ignited by lightning. The prehistoric man would have crawled under his bed when the lightning flashed—if he had a bed. But as it was he was scared half to death. He didn't know what it was or why, when soon after the forest or the grass would be aflame. But the fire that raged probably killed many animals too slow to get out of the way. Some of those animals were the same ones the man killed with a club and ate.

One day he may have been hungry and, game being scarce after the fire, discovered a fried animal, tasted it and found it palatable. He discovered that cooked meat is pretty tasty, much more so than the raw flesh he was used to eating. At the time, he and his hump-backed wife, as well as his low-browed children, had been eating raw meat; he hadn't started yet raising vegetables. Those he gathered from the forest or the jungle he ate raw. They wore his teeth down, right to the gums. He wasn't very bright because he neglected to wash the sand off. The food was pretty gritty but it was stomach-filling. Cookery Begins

He may have taken some burning embers home from the forest fire and attempted to tell his wife how very delicious cooked flesh was. If she bestirred herself and kept fuel on the fire, he may have told her, they could enjoy cooked meat, they could enjoy the fire to go out, he would have to wait until the next electrical storm set the woods afire. Then, if they didn't die of smoke inhalation, they could cook again. Up until the electrical storm, they all continued to eat raw meat. Another possibility—is that it could have happened—is that the prehistoric man may have made his bed by piling leaves, grass or any other vegetation in a corner of the cave. He probably slept on a leaf bed before he learned how to dress and preserve the skins of animals. Not being too bright, he may have piled vegetation in the corner that heated up when in a heavy mass. He didn't know what spontaneous combustion was, but if his bed caught fire he knew he had made a mistake somewhere. It must have been uncomfortable, fleeing his burning bed in his skin night-dress. Another interesting fact about prehistoric fire making is that any hypothesis may be right or wrong. No one will ever know for sure.

Small Worlds Around Us
 By LYNN M. WATKINS
 (Register and Tribune Syndicate, 1963)

Just what happened before the advent of the flint and steel or the sharply pointed, rotated stick is pure guesswork. But in all the conjectures surrounding man's first discovery of fire, one fact alone stands out as certain: he didn't discover it by smoking in bed, thereby igniting the bearskins.

How he really did discover fire is even more uncertain than is the modern dictionary maker when he tries to define fire. How the first domestic fire was started is one of the questions modern day science probably will always seek but never find. Of course, fire was present and occurred rather frequently long before there was a human ancestor on this earth. Ever since, succeeding generations of men have attempted explanations, but they are all guesses. There is no real evidence to substantiate any of the theories.

Fire is not an element or a substance. It has no weight. When the fuel on which it feeds is consumed, there is nothing of the actual fire left: nothing to offer the most astute scientist the faintest evidence of what it was or how it began.

Ignited by Lightning
 Early fires were ignited by lightning. The prehistoric man would have crawled under his bed when the lightning flashed—if he had a bed. But as it was he was scared half to death. He didn't know what it was or why, when soon after the forest or the grass would be aflame. But the fire that raged probably killed many animals too slow to get out of the way.  Portland (UPI) - The state of Oregon showed signs today of emerging from its deep freeze but streets and highways in many areas remained hazardous. Snow flurries and light drizzle, some of it freezing, were forecast.

Portland got a light dusting of snow Sunday which turned into freezing drizzle during the night. This morning streets were sheets of ice and motorists skidded to work during the rush hour. Forecasts called for highs above freezing in western Oregon and parts of eastern Oregon today, but lows down to 26 west of the Cascades and to 12 east of the mountains tonight.
