Food Said Kept Fresh 'Forever' With Radiation

Natick, Mass. - (UPI) - Radio-active rays now can process fish, meats and other foods so that they remain fresh forever without refrigeration.

The process was disclosed to 300 scientists at the opening of a three-day international conference on radiation research at laboratories of the U.S. Army Materiel Command.

"This is the first truly new process for preserving food that the world has received in 150 years," Dr. Edward S. Josephson, laboratory director, said.

The $2.5 million laboratory irradiates food through the world's largest source of cobalt-60, a source of 1,200,000 curies, officials said. It injects rays into foods that pass on a conveyor belt.

All food, officials explained, contains bacteria which causes the food to spoil. Radiation kills the bacteria.

Therefore, if the food is irradiated and then packaged it can be preserved indefinitely without refrigeration.

Refrigeration is a means of delaying the action of the bacteria. If the bacteria is killed, you do not need to refrigerate, they said.

A piece of irradiated meat could lie around a pantry for a few months or forever, officials said, and would remain usable as long as it was kept clean and moist. Its taste also would not change.

They said the process, now awaiting U.S. Food and Drug Administration approval, may not have a large impact in the United States but could revolutionize eating habits of underdeveloped nations which lack refrigeration.

Forester Named as Banquet Speaker

Corvallis - A Washington forestry leader, Charles S. Cowan, has been named speaker for the 31st annual school of forestry Fernhopper Banquet at Oregon State university, Feb. 23.

Cowan is a Kirkland, Wash. consulting forester and recently retired as chief warden of the Washington Forest fire association.

The Fernhopper Banquet is one of the west's largest gathering of foresters. It annually attracts about 800 Northwest foresters, loggers, lumbermen and friends of the OSU school of forestry.

The banquet will climax a day of forestry activities on campus including tours of facilities and reports on school of forestry advances and plans for the future, along with discussions on latest research findings in forestry.
