HOW THEY'RE TRAINING YOUTH FOR MODERN MARRIAGE

THE GIRL with green eye shadow was in tears. A boy whom she did not know had pinched her as they passed in the hall.

This was the opportunity her teacher-counselor at a junior high school in one of the more affluent districts of Washington, D.C., had been waiting for. They sat down together after school and had a heart-to-heart talk.

The girl was shocked when the teacher of health education pointed out that her appearance and dress—penciled eyebrows, pancake make-up, exaggerated hairdo, tight skirt—had invited the familiarity.

It had never occurred to the girl to relate her new personality, which she had "put on" just because other girls were doing it, with the effect it might have on the other sex. After the talk with the teacher, her attitude and manner of dress changed entirely.

This is but one of the many ways in which the Washington school system is seeking to provide guidance to youngsters involved in the emotional difficulties that can limit their chances of success later on in marriage. The moving force is a carefully thought-out program of training in personal and family living, starting in kindergarten and going through high school.

Although the school system provides the impetus, there is active participation by parents, church groups, and civic organizations. Thus, an entire community is going all-out with an organized attack on a great dilemma—the troubles arising from the early maturing and social precociousness of our youth.

One reason advanced for such precocious behavior is that adolescents today respond more to the judgment of other youngsters than to the opinions of their parents.

They go steady, they marry young because "the other kids are doing it."

Washington educators have scored by facing squarely that fact of life and turning it to advantage. In the city's program the students agree on, put in writing, and abide by their own standards of desirable conduct. And it's surprising how eagerly the young-
