In the Day's News

Question for today? What's a SUBSTRATE? Did you ever hear of one? WELL, neither did I until the mail the other day brought to my desk the latest bulletin of the Klamath County Chamber of Commerce.

"Some Chamber of Commerce activities are out of this world. For example: At the request of the USAF School of Aerospace Medicine at Brooks Field, Texas, we are arranging for the procurement and shipment to the school of 20 to 30 pounds of LAVA."

"The school needs it, the request says, as a soil SUBSTRATE for its experiments concerning the planet Mars! So we're sending the lava."

WEBSTER'S Unabridged Dictionary defines SUBSTRATE as "a substance acted upon, as by an enzyme." It defines an enzyme as "any of a class of complex substances that accelerate (catalyze) specific TRANSFORMATIONS of material."

Quite interesting. But it sheds no light on why the U.S. Air Force wants some lava for use in its Mars experiments. So we turned to the World Encyclopedia, which tells all about lava and how it pours out of volcanoes and runs down their sides and finally cools and hardens, forming a crust of rock.

It concludes with this cryptic sentence: "Lands that once were covered by lava are often VERY FERTILE after the lava is broken up into fine soil."

Maybe the USAF scientists want to grind up some lava so that some GOOD SOIL can be created on the planet Mars - in which event we might be able in the course of time to provide another New World to which the people of this world might emigrate when conditions get too rough to be endured - as did our forefathers when Columbus discovered the New World of the Western Hemisphere.

It's a screwball thought, of course. But in these modern days almost ANYTHING is possible.

Anyway - If lava is what is needed for such a project, we can furnish it. We have an inexhaustible supply of it here in the high country.

A MODERN tragedy - as described for us by the San Francisco Chronicle: "It is a shocking and depressing thing to learn that San Franciscans, whether from sloth, indifference or ignorance, have brought about the atrophy of their mussels. Not only have mussels marinerie vanished from the local menus, but a salivating survey by this newspaper reveals, the petite and succulent bivalve is nowhere available in the city's markets for smothering in a tincture of olive oil, discreetly spiced and garlicked."

WHAT has become of the mussels? Here's at least a possible answer: As all convivial-minded convention-goers are aware, a lady named Mary Ann McCarty once went down to get some clams. She didn't have much luck. As recited in the famous ballad:

"She dug up all the ersters in San Francisco bay, but she couldn't find a Gee Dee clam."

IT JUST could be, you know, that in the process of digging up all the "ersters" in her celebrated search for some clams, Mary Ann may have dug up all the mussels also, and in the process may have so disturbed their natural habitat that they were never again able to establish themselves.

This theory isn't guaranteed. It is merely offered for what it may be worth.

Ullman Predicts Kennedy Will Get Requested Tax Cut

"It gets back to a fundamental concept of what produces prosperity and a healthy growth," he said, "and I think it stems from consumer dollars available for spending. The opposing theory is that it stems from the desire of business to invest."

He felt that the method of allowing tax cuts to both corporations and individual consumers would stimulate business to reinvest and people to spend.

"I believe the hearings last year demonstrated that the competent businesses will move in where there is a demonstrable market, even under the present tax structure," he said, "Therefore, we need increased purchasing power on the part of the American consumer who, generally speaking, spends all his money. The increased purchasing power will not just stimulate the economy but will actually multiply, maybe change hands 10 times - to the service industries, the trade industries and so on. The cumulative effect will greatly build the economy."

Ullman does not fear inflation with the release of additional consumer dollars. Stopped Inflation Spiral

"The situation doesn't exist for classical inflation, which is the result of more people wanting things than there are new things to buy. Although the cost of living is inching up, I would say it is almost under control."

He believes that with "one stroke" President Kennedy stopped another spiral of runaway inflation which would have resulted from a drastic rise in steel prices last year. Ullman believes the basic ingredients of inflation are the result of a combination of administered prices on the part of industry and administered labor rises as a result of strike action.

Ullman believes that "since our national productivity is nearly twice as much as our national debt, the size of the debt is manageable and nothing to be alarmed about, and that the financial condition of the United States in relation to its total assets is the soundest of any government in the world."

Ullman thinks that the bookkeeping procedures of the government confuse the public into thinking the President's budget is similar to a household budget and that there must be a tight balance between a fixed income and outgo.

Like Business Operation "This isn't true at all," he said. "It is more like a business operation where the income is not fixed. It can be small or large, depending on the state of the economy."

"Business desperately needs capital investments to put its house in order so that they can establish a competitive position. And that, essentially, is what we are trying to do, adjust expenditures and adjust taxes. It is always a delicate balance."

Ullman believes tax reform is equally important, but declined to suggest specific reforms until the President submits his recommendations.
