

Actor Al St. John Dies in Georgia

Lyons, Ga. — (UPI) — Private services were held in a funeral home Tuesday for actor Al St. John who performed in movies and on television as Fuzzy Q. Jones.

St. John, 70, died of a heart attack Monday in a motel room. He had been making personal appearances in this area with his wife, Flo Belle Moore, who was with him when he died.

St. John's body was to be cremated later at Macon, Ga., and the ashes deposited at his Double F Ranch at Homosassa Springs, Fla.

A native of Santa Ana, Calif., St. John performed in approximately 300 movies, most of them Westerns. He was best known to today's young television viewers as the companion of "Captain Gallant," a series starring Buster Crabbe.

Pioneer Ointment Concocted From Various Animal Fats

There seems no particular reason why a "fly in the ointment" should have been such a catastrophe, unless we consider the feelings of the fly... which few of us ever do. So just why the big deal? The fly is notorious for getting into things. There's nothing unusual about it at all, but ointment certainly would seem one substance the fly would avoid.

Ointment is supposed to be soft, unctuous and soothing to the human skin. It is expected to relieve and heal inflamed skin as it usually contains some form of medication. Skin lotion was hard for the pioneer housewife to come by. There was no corner drugstore, so homemade remedies had to be concocted from available materials.

Cracked Lips

Lips sometimes cracked open and would often actually bleed. Chapping of hands and wrists, from contact with snow and freezing rain, would frequently result in physical pain. The skin became rough, reddened and sore... so sensitive to the touch it was painful to smile, to eat or to bend the wrist. All these conditions had to be treated with home ingredients, and these all had to be made and administered by the housewife.

For the purpose of ointment making, the pioneer housewife melted various animal fats which served as the vehicle for holding the medication in contact with the skin. Ointment without medication were usually called emollients and were often scented with rose water, rose petals or any other fragrance available from the backyard garden or from the surrounding forest.

To make a soothing salve, various fats and oils were collected, some of them impossible to duplicate today. Maybe this is just as well but back then some of them came pretty close to being good. At least they must have seemed good at the time.

Best of All

One of the very best materials for a healing, soothing emollient was rendered bear fat or bear grease as they called it. The family who had bear grease on hand was indeed fortunate. Just the grease alone, without any medical quality at all—orange or other fragrance—was supposed to be the very best of ointment. Of course, not all folks had a brave hunter at the head of the household, so other fats had to be used. Each claimed his was a superior product.

Goose grease was one of the best, as many people believed it aided healing quicker than bear grease. A few rose petals placed in the fat while hot, added a delightful fragrance. Chicken fat had many devotees, as did lard and melted suet. But they were common materials and usually available. Chicken fat had an eye appeal too—it was a rich, golden yellow in color.

There was one school of thought which claimed there was nothing as good for making ointment, salve or an emollient as good old skunk fat. No one ever found a fly in it, but it was soothing and healing. If you knew it was skunk fat, you imagined it had a peculiar, woody fragrance.
