'Living Entities' In Interplanetary Void Said Possible

Washington—(UPI)—Space itself may carry the seeds of life.
This notion—that spores or germs or some other "living entities" drift constantly through the interplanetary void in blind search of a home—is not a new one.
It is called panspermia, and most biologists are skeptical of it. But doubting something is true is not the same as knowing it is false.

So a group of responsible scientists has recommended to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration that "the biological exploration of interplanetary space should be seriously attempted."

Top Priority Urged
This same group, in a study sponsored by the National Academy of Sciences, urged NASA to give top priority in its space program to the search for life outside the earth.

The most likely place to find extraterrestrial life in the solar system is the planet Mars, the scientists feel. But if by any chance there is something to the idea of panspermia, space itself would be worth "biological exploration."
Panspermia is the brainchild of Svante August Arrhenius, a Swedish physicist and chemist who died in 1927. Arrhenius, who won the 1903 Nobel prize in chemistry, suggested that life is being disseminated throughout the universe from wherever it originated by the process of panspermia.

Modern belief, on the other hand, is that life was developed independently on billions of planets suitably situated, like the Earth, at the right distance from a steady, well-behaved star like the sun.

Survival Means Unknown
Today's scientists do not see how so-called life "disseminates", even if they somehow got dislodged from one planet, could survive the radiation and other hazards of space long enough to migrate to another.
But if living entities have embarked on space flight only to die in the void, their remains may still be drifting between the planets or may have come to rest somewhere.

In their recommendation to NASA, the biologists said "lunar samples should contain dead organisms accumulated from space if the panspermia hypothesis is valid."
And, they added, it is arguable "that some not-yet-killed units may be present in deep space."
