

100 Per Cent Pay Cut

Quarterback as Peace Corps Member May Benefit Washington Redskins

By DICK WEST Washington — Almost everyone here except Rep. Victor Wickersham thought it was appropriate for gridiron star Norm Snead to go to work for the Peace Corps. Snead is currently the quarterback for the Washington Redskins, who for years have been one of the most peaceable corps in professional football.

It was generally felt that his association with such an unbellicose organization as the Redskins would make him ideally suited for an off-season job as a Peace Corps consultant.

The Redskins are noted for having off-seasons even when the season is in full swing.

By the same token it was surmised that the Redskins, in turn, might well benefit from Snead's experience with the Peace Corps.

The corps is devoted to providing technical advice and assistance to underdeveloped countries. A look at their record for the past decade will lead you to the conclusion that the Redskins certainly qualify as underdeveloped.

The hope is that Snead will pick up some pointers that might be useful in rehabilitating the Redskins. While recruiting athletic instructors for duty overseas, perhaps he also will be able to recruit a couple of tackles and maybe a fullback.

Despite the evidence that Snead and the Peace Corps were made for each other, Wickersham objected to his employment, basing his dissent not so much on the principle of the thing as the money.

As a Democratic congressman from Oklahoma, he took the position that $75 a day was a somewhat excessive fee for the Peace Corps to be paying a rookie consultant.

In Oklahoma, football teams are more famed for their ferocity than their generosity. It was understandable that Wickersham would be opposed to a policy of Peace Corpsmen at any price.

Either because of Wickersham's protest or in spite of it, Peace Corps Director Sargent Shriver quickly converted his consultant to an unpaid status, making Snead the Peace Corps equivalent of a dollar-a-year man.

Snead thus became one of the few professional athletes to absorb a 100 per cent pay cut in a single off-season.

Not even George Preston Marshall, the open-handed owner of the Redskins, has been able to go that far. When Shriver leaves the government, Marshall may want to hire him as a consultant. As for Wickersham, I have no information to indicate whether he ever played football. But judging from the way he was putting the rush on Snead, he could be an all-pro linebacker.
