Boxer's Devotion to Master Equaled Only by Courage

The expression, "hang-dog look" or "sad-eyed hound," never could apply to that popular breed of dog we know as the "boxer," whose popularity during the last few years testifies to the desirability of this breed of canine.

MOO-O-OS and MUSINGS

In old German and English castles, woven in tapestries that adorned those musty walls, were crude images of sturdy, smooth haired dogs fighting wild boars.

The boxer breed of dog probably reached its greatest perfection in Germany, as long as four centuries ago. It would seem logical to suppose the boxer would have acquired a German name, but the word "boxer" is typically English.

This canine king of dogdom carries his square, black-masked head proudly; he moves with the grace and ease of an aristocrat; he displays at all times a friendly affection for his master and his household.

There has always been considerable conjecture regarding the reason why this breed of dog was named "boxer." One very plausible explanation, probably as near correct as is now possible to establish, dates back to the days of "bull-baiting" and "dog-fighting" when the dog would rear up on his hind legs, waving the front paws in much the same attitude as that assumed by a human prize fighter.

At one time the boxer dog was the preferred breed for police work, and were so used in Germany. This work required bravery, strength and tremendous aggressiveness, as well as courage and a high degree of animal intelligence.

The boxer's everlastingly credit let be said he fights fair, for he is an honorable animal — true to his friends and tolerant with his enemies.
