Salt Water Plants To Help Relieve Drought Considered

Washington – (UPI) – Interior Undersecretary James K. Carr has called for the construction of standby salt water conversion plants to meet drought - caused water shortages in Southern California, Texas, Florida and New York.

Carr told the House Interior Committee that within a few years it would be possible to turn sea water into fresh water for economical use in some rapidly growing cities.

He said the Interior Department was "optimistic" that salt water could be turned into fresh water economically if conversion plants were built in combination with steam electric plants.

The gap between the cost of water from saline plants and conventional methods for obtaining municipal and industrial water is closing rapidly, Carr said.

But he warned that the conversion of salt water for irrigation purposes was still "not within sight" at costs competitive with ordinary irrigation methods.

He told the committee that Interior Secretary Stewart L. Udall had ordered an "all-out effort" by bureaus under his direction to seek economical methods for turning sea water into fresh water.

"It appears that it is possible, particularly in the Pacific Southwest, with larger size plants and with known processes, to produce water for about the same cost that it would require for transportation of surface fresh water supplies over long distances," he said.

The key, Carr said, probably would be the cost of fuel to operate the conversion plant. He said it was estimated that with natural gas it might be possible to produce up to 30 million gallons a day at a cost of $100 per acre-foot, or 30 cents per thousand gallons.

In San Francisco, he said the wholesale cost of municipal water to communities currently approaches $90 per acre-foot in some areas.

Carr said a 25-million gallon plant operating in conjunction with a power plant selling electricity for six mills per kilowatt hour could sell water for $35 per acre-foot.

"Such a price for municipal water would definitely be competitive in many areas of the United States, particularly in the Pacific Southwest and in parts of Florida," he said.

In areas such as Southern California, Carr said, there "just isn't any more water to be developed from the usual sources."

"The price of water is whatever you have to pay to get it," he said.

Asked by a reporter what effect the conversion plants would have on California's $1.75 billion Feather River Project to carry water to the Los Angeles area, Carr said the Feather River Project would be able to deliver water more cheaply.

His suggestion for construction of standby water plants should not cause a delay in construction of projects such as California's Oroville and Auburn dams, Carr said.

AT A COUNTRY auction, Mrs. Peggy Weldman won a rare old hand-blown whiskey bottle with a bid of twenty-two dollars. An old farmer had watched her bidding with mounting disbelief. Now, as her bottle was delivered to her, he leaned over to take a closer look at it. "Gosh a'mighty," he gasped to his wife. It's EMPTY!"

Dangers of Carbon Monoxide

One of the sad features of a cold winter is that during this season many people die of carbon monoxide gas poisoning. Carbon monoxide is formed in any stove except an electric one, and is to be found in the exhaust fumes coming away from every gasoline engine. Carbon monoxide is dangerous because when breathed in, it combines with the hemoglobin (red coloring matter of the blood) and combines so firmly that it will not quickly let go as the oxygen in the air does.

Alvarez

When the hemoglobin of a person becomes taken up with carbon monoxide, it can no longer combine with oxygen, and then the person in a way, suffocates. Worst of all, the best part of his brain can be so severely damaged by lack of oxygen that if the person recovers enough to live, he may be left a sort of human vegetable.

I am stimulated to write of this problem today because I just heard of an attractive couple, a boy and girl, who after a dance went out to sit in a car for a while. To keep warm, they closed all the windows and left the engine running. Somehow or other, carbon monoxide came up into the car, where it killed the girl and almost killed the young man.

A while ago, a neighbor of mine, a business man, who loved to spend an evening tuning up the engine of his car, was found lying on the floor of his small garage. He had made the mistake of closing the door and leaving the engine running.

One of the terrible features of carbon monoxide poisoning is that when it begins to affect a person it may only make him drowsy and happy-go-lucky. He may not realize his terrible danger and worse yet, if he does realize it, he may not be able to get up to open a door, or open a window or to turn off an engine or a burner on a stove.

Could Not Respond

As I remember, Dr. Stefansson, the great Arctic explorer, long ago told in one of his books how once, when he was in an igloo (a closed hut made of blocks of ice), he suddenly realized that he was getting drowsy and was probably being poisoned with carbon monoxide coming from a poorly functioning stove. When he asked the Eskimos with him to open the sort of door of the igloo, they could not respond. Stefansson soon realized that he no longer had the strength to crawl out of the hut—but fortunately, he had enough strength left to lunge backward and knock a hole in the wall behind him. This let in enough clean air so that his life was saved.

Heating equipment should be checked for leaks, because many a family has been killed by carbon monoxide coming from a faulty stove, or a faulty heating unit in the basement.

The only way in which to avoid being killed by carbon monoxide gas is to keep remembering how hundreds of people die—perhaps in a parked and closed car with the engine running.

Three Main Factors Control Pork Flavor

Madison, Wis. –(UPI)– What makes one pork chop better than another?

A lot of things, say researchers at the University of Wisconsin. But the three most important factors are the weight of the pig, its age and the amount of marbling in the chop.

California was the first state in the Union to organize a tuna research program of tagging fish to study diseases, migrations and mating habits.
