Eye-Witness Experiences of Cuban Invasion Are Discussed

The manager of a Nicaraguan lumber company, whose equipment was used in loading ships and barges for the ill-fated Bay of Pigs Cuban invasion attempt, discussed some of his eye-witness experiences at the Monday luncheon of the Medford Chamber of Commerce Roundtable.

Now a retired resident of the Rogue valley, Verne Christy spent "10 exciting years" in the lumber business in the Central American country as general manager for the eight sawmills of the Nicaragua Longleaf Pine Lumber company, a Nicaraguan corporation owned by a United States family.

Christy said he and his family first moved to Nicaragua in 1952, and during the next 10 years were witnesses to a "revolution about every seven months."

Shooting and Noise

"These little wars consisted of lots of shooting and noise, but not many casualties," Christy said.

The speaker said conditions are "ripe" for a communist take-over in Nicaragua. The natives, about 90 per cent illiterate, have changed from a friendly people to either an aloof or "downright antagonistic" attitude lately.

Though he did not specify exact times or dates, Christy said that in the months prior to the invasion attempt, groups or teams of specialists from the United States began to appear in areas along the Mosquito Coast from Nicaragua.

A weather team moved in, a radar screen was constructed north of Porto Cabezas (where Christy had his home), a Goedetic Survey team began to take soundings off the coast, and aerial photographs of the area were taken, the speaker said.

Engineers Appear

A team of U.S. engineers appeared in Porto Cabezas, ostensibly to give President Anastasio Somoza a cost figure on lengthening the city's airstrip, Christy said. They asked to rent some of his company's equipment, but the speaker said he turned them down.

They came back a few days later, he said, with some "letters of introduction" (the speaker did not say from whom), and he then agreed to rent them some machinery they needed. Christy said the men told him, after running a security check on him, that "Castro was going to be knocked over."

The decision was made, the speaker said, that Porto Cabezas was to be used as the staging area for the invasion. Planes, boats, supplies and war material began arriving, "but security kept it hush-hush," he said. Ships arrived carrying munitions plainly labeled as such.

Plan to Attack

Christy said the plan of attack on Cuba was outlined to him by some of the U.S. officials who were, presumably, directing the invasion planning. It was as follows:

—U. S. planes loaded with paratroopers were to head for Cuba.

—Ships were to position themselves within striking distance of the island.

—Bombers and jet fighters were to come in low over Cuba, criss-crossing the island and making a noisy show of force to panic and confuse the population.

—The paratroopers were to drop inland; the foot soldiers were to land and then march inland, cutting the country in two, isolating the eastern half.

—The Cuban underground was to be given assistance with supplies and arms.

Invasion Force

Christy said the invasion force consisted of between 2,300 and 2,500 exiled Cubans.

On D-Day, Christy said, the planes loaded with bombs and troops took off, but while they were in the air, word suddenly came that all U.S. support for the invasion was "called off."

"The world was told that we (the U.S.) would take no part in the invasion," the speaker said.

The paratroopers were captured as they came down, he said, and the foot soldiers, after cutting their way about two-thirds of the way across the island, also were taken prisoner. The ships lying off shore were sunk by the seven planes Castro got in the air.

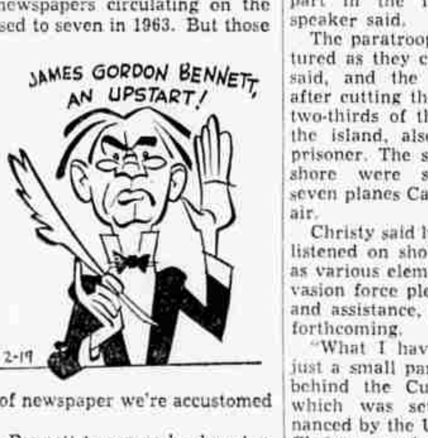
Christy said he and his wife listened on short wave radio as various elements of the invasion force pleaded for help and assistance, but none was forthcoming.

"What I have told you is just a small part of the story behind the Cuban invasion, which was set up and financed by the United States," Christy concluded. "In the end, 1,100 prisoners were ransomed for something in excess of $53 million."

Try and Stop Me

By BENNETT CERF

IN THE MIDDLE 1830's, Richard O'Connor points out, there were fifteen daily newspapers circulating on the streets of New York—as opposed to seven in 1963. But those papers of the 1830's had little to offer their readers in the way of news or features. A murder was dismissed in a few lines if it was mentioned at all. Court actions, misbehavior by socialites or celebrities, and business misfortunes were absolutely taboo. One man changed all this. James Gordon Bennett, whose irreverent New York Herald introduced on May 6, 1835, soon set a new pattern that was the direct forerunner of the kind of newspaper we're accustomed to reading today.



Before they had to emulate Bennett to escape bankruptcy, however, his competitors labeled him "an obscene vagabond," "a leprous slanderer," "a profligate wretch," "a pestilential scoundrel," and "a vile nuisance." They capitulated when the Herald's circulation soared to 51,000—against 36,000 for his three principal rivals combined!

Winter autoists will appreciate a cartoon from a Northwestern weekly that shows a weary husband who has just dug a 50-yard patch through a six-foot snowdrift from his garage to the road. As he is about to open the garage door with a sigh of relief, his wife calls out from the kitchen, "Oh, I forgot to tell you, dear, I took the car over to mother's yesterday before the storm started."

State Auditor Office Favored

Salem — (UPI) — Legislative leaders said Monday they favored creation of the office of state auditor, and indicated there is growing support for annual sessions of the legislature.

Senate President Ben Musa and House Speaker Clarence Barton gave strong support to a plan announced Saturday by Rep. Richard Eymann (D-Marcola) to establish a state auditor's office.

Eymann's plan calls for an auditor to be elected to an eight - year term, to handle post-audit functions now conducted by the secretary of state. The Eymann proposal is patterned after a section of the proposed new Oregon constitution.
