Nation's Education System Tool Of Cold War Policy, Is Charge

Editor's note: The following is the second of two columns devoted to the Child Study Association's two-day conference on changing family patterns.

New York—The nation's families have permitted our educational system to "become an instrument of Cold War policy," said Dr. Harold Taylor, former president of Sarah Lawrence college.

Dr. Taylor, now vice president and counsel on education for the Peace Research Institute, Washington, criticized the family's acquiescent role in education in a speech before the Child Study Association of America.

The association, observing its 75th anniversary, co-sponsored with Better Homes and Gardens magazine a two-day conference on changing family life.

The Peace Research Institute is a privately financed organization gathering educators and others in a program of working for peace. Dr. Taylor said that Arthur Larson, formerly with USA and a speech writer for former President Eisenhower, is the institute's president.

What Can One Man Do? The educator said the modern citizen is faced with the dilemma of "having seen the possibilities for disaster or survival" in this nuclear age, but "sees no way in which his own acts can change the flow of history."

"In consequence," he added, "the citizen inclines to accept the situation in which he finds himself . . . accepts the palliatives by which he may conceal from himself the reality of what comes next . . ."

"For example, the fallout shelters of New York where each can find his allotted space to die, the shots to the moon by which one may distract oneself from the situation of the earth . . ."

"How does this affect the family?" Dr. Taylor asked. His answer: "The effect has been for the families to allow the educational system to become an instrument of Cold War policy, and to sanction programs in which teachers are asked to teach their children how to cower in basements, their hands covering their eyes, in one of the most extraordinary displays of organized irrationality and indignity which American politics has ever spawned."

False Goals Dr. Taylor charged that today, under the "constant admonition of public figures to eliminate frills of education—such frills as learning how to live, how to enjoy a poem, and how to think for oneself—the American family has joined the national race to compete with the Soviet Union in academic achievement."

This, he said, is an achievement whose goals are set, "not by a conception of the educated man as an enlightened world citizen, but by the ability to pass examinations in academic subjects at the earliest possible age."

He charged that the American family is victim of a neurosis . . . which "sacrifices the true purpose of education in favor of an obedience to the national will."

"Where is there now room for growing up?" Dr. Taylor asked. "Where is there room for those hours of idleness and talk which can serve to establish a personal character for the student who does not yet know who he is?"

The educator said he was not arguing against the discipline of work at tasks "whose demands are serious and explicit."

"But I submit . . . that to identify the goals of life with the achievement of the superficial triumphs of grade-getting is to deny the value of life itself. Yet this is now the dominant mode of the American family attitude."

New Compacts Designed for apartments, trailer homes, and the family cabin are compact ranges that take up fewer than 21 inches of floor space. They are available in both gas and electric.

Special features available in electric ranges are fog-proofed oven windows, brighter lighting within ovens, a broiler controls that cook meat "rare," "medium" or "well-done."

Recent models have many easy-to-clean features such as oven linings which pull out, simplified broilers, and drop down oven doors.

In higher priced models, a thermostatically controlled surface unit automatically cycles the heat off and on to maintain the heat selected. Some panels have lights to show when units are on, an important safety feature.

In gas ranges, shoppers will find under counter oven and broiler combinations, installed with cooktop above or in another location. Also new, says OSU's home management specialist, is programmed oven cooking. Controls automatically change one temperature setting to another — usually from "cooking" to "keep warm." This allows food to be cooked, then held several hours without overcooking.

New York—Note the resemblance? Besides the matching bow this model looks just as easy as the basset hound. According to New York hair stylist Julius Caruso and the Lill Reference service forecast, the model's Basset Bob—flop ear silhouette with hair fashioned side-hanging loops—is big for Spring. Caruso says the U.S. women are going to the dogs for other hair styles too. (UPI)

Kitchen Range Advances Outlined by Specialist

Corvallis — Shopping for a new kitchen range? You'll see more variety in all price models, some luxury features in the lower price ranges, and a whole new line of compact ranges that will fit a cabin at the beach or a small kitchen.

Bernice Strawn, Oregon State university extension specialist, says that features formerly available on higher-priced ranges have been added to lower-priced models. These include more automatic cookery, more precise controls, restyled back splashes, and easy-to-use clocks. Some ovens hold cooked meat at ready-to-eat temperatures for up to six hours.

Free standing ranges now come with eye level oven and broiler. Some models have slide-out surface units which have become more popular because of an attractive built-in look. Some ranges slide in between cabinets or at the end of a line of cabinets. Chrome trim may be added at each side to overlap counters, to prevent crumbs from dropping between range and cabinet.
