Old Swimming Hole Became Lonely Place After Incident
A well worn path, following the line of least resistance and fewest obstacles, led to the muddy edge of the enlargement in the little brook. During most of its winding course the little stream was a few feet in width, but a couple of logs and a tangle of brush, held together with a couple of hundred stones, partly dammed the brook and the acre or so enlargement became the "old swimming hole," frequented in the hot months of summer by nearly all the boys from the nearby village.

At the time, none of the boys who swam there had the slightest idea that this usually muddy depression in the river's bed would build a chain of pleasant memories that, in later years, would be highly treasured and fondly remembered. During those golden summer days it was the "cooling off place," the one spot where the boys could swim or lie on the bank with complete abandon and without hearing parental command to "do this or that."

Years later some of the boys, now grown and successful, could vividly remember how soft and warm and pleasantly cozy the mud felt as it squeezed between bare toes as boyish feet felt along in the muddy shallows, or how easily it washed away as the young body assumed a horizontal position in the water and dog-paddled toward the pond's other side.

Those unseen things that slithered and wriggled underfoot were treated with shrieks and simulated terror by the younger boys. They imagined all manner of crawly things, pictured some as monstrous and dangerous. The older boys treated with scorn all those childish annoyances, viewing with worldly sophistication all unseen creatures, as well as the "small-fry" who became frightened just because a "little old salamander" crawled under a shrinking foot.

From the low bank the "old swimming hole" looked like what it was—a small pond hiding what it really sheltered, a galaxy of living things that remained always hidden in the murky depths. The splashing of the boys quited all those aquatic beings, sent them rushing pell-mell into the ooze of the bottom or behind water weeds or to any available hiding place. Then, to all outward appearances, the swimming hole was inhabited only by boys swimming or splashing in the not too clear water.

There was one inhabitant of the old swimming hole that commanded the respect of all the boys, both the small ones and those older ones who claimed to be afraid of nothing. That denizen of the murky waters was a large snapping turtle whose ugly head above the surface made the swimming hole much less inviting.

Usually, a few stones pitched in the turtle's general direction caused the withdrawal of the head. The braver boys waded cautiously into the edge of the pond. On such occasions there were more boys on the bank than in the water. Even the patches of poison ivy that grew profusely on the creek bank seemed less dangerous than the unseen snapper.

dragged down the baby duck. That did it. In spite of the August heat the old swimming hole became a lonely place. The big snapper and all the lesser creatures had the place to themselves. One of the best ways to avoid danger is not to have too much aversion to it; even the bravest know restraint.

Prospect Home Is Destroyed by Fire

Prospect—Plans to form a fire district here were given additional impetus when fire of undetermined origin destroyed a store room near the home of J. B. Wyatt, five miles west of Prospect about 2 a.m. Sunday.

Lost in the fire were a deep freeze about half full of food, about 100 quarts of canned fruit, an electric stove, television set, lawn mower and other tools, and 30 baby chicks.

A member of the family was awakened by the sound of what seemed to be an explosion, looked out and noticed the fire.

It was the second serious fire in this area in the past week. The home of Mr. and Mrs. Tom Scriven and their four sons was destroyed Friday afternoon.

A public meeting to make plans for a fire protection district has been called for Friday, March 29, at 7:30 p.m. at the Prospect Community hall.

DeMolay, Veterans State Competition

White City—About 25 members of the Medford Order of DeMolay inaugurated weekly Sunday friendly competition with members of the Veterans Administration Domiciliary here this week. Paul C. Bethel, recreation chief, has announced. Under the supervision of Bob Kingle, the Medford youths are free to engage in darts, shuffleboard, checkers, chess, cribbage, billiards, horseshoes, croquet, golf, bac- ci ball and lawn bowling. A trophy which looks some like the ultra-modern sculpture in some far-out exhibitions was won by the members on a point system last Sunday. The trophy is an old tennis shoe connected to a bent piece of steel strip con- torted all out of shape.
