School, Utility Buildings To Be Built at Park

Plans for a $115,000 school building and $185,000 utility building at Crater Lake National park have been announced by the Oregon Congressional delegation. Actual construction is expected to begin about mid-July. At the present time students in grades one through eight attend classes in the park administration building. The space now used by the elementary school is needed for administrative purposes. Dependent on weather conditions, completion of the school building is expected by the fall of 1965. It will be used by approximately 40 children of park employees. The National Park service explained that the rather unique case of the service providing school classrooms was due to the practical isolation of the park during much of the winter. Crater Lake National park normally has one of the heaviest snow packs of any national park in the country. The utility building will be used to house the various pieces of equipment used in the park. The $130,000 contract for the design of both the school and utility buildings was awarded to the architectural firm of Ranks and Norman, Portland.

WEAKNESSES EMERGING IN TRAINING PROGRAM On Jan. 28, 1963, the Michigan Employment Security Commission in Detroit started a search for 20 men to train under the 1962 Manpower Development and Training Act for immediately available jobs as Police cadets. As of last month, it had spent 320 hours on the search, reviewed 8,900 applications, screened 139, referred 83 candidates to the Civil Service—and then it shelved the project until July. Reason? Out of the entire lot the Civil Service found only six "suitable applicants." The rest simply didn't qualify for training, and now the MESC is trying to figure out how to find men who might.

On Oct. 19, 1962, when the Manpower Development Act was just getting under way, an MESC survey indicated a need for 200 practical nurses in Detroit alone and for at least 1,500 in the state. As of today, almost six months later, the training of the nurses in Detroit hasn't even been started. Reason? The commission can't get the facilities—neither the instructors nor the equipment—to train applicants for the immediately available jobs.

On July 30, 1963, the first fiscal year during which Michigan has been working on training projects will end. As of that date, the state will have spent only $2.2 million of a federal government allotment of $3 million for training allowances and costs in the current year. Reason? Michigan officials have found it exceedingly difficult to get the training program off the ground, have been hit by one bitter frustration after the other. Along with other states, Michigan has discovered that there are great problems as well as great promises involved in this project and before training-retraining of America's workers can become truly effective, many changes will be essential in our attitudes, our educational systems, our laws.

This August will mark the first anniversary of the signing of the revolutionary MDTA—a significant breakthrough in tackling the problem of training America's workers in the new and superior skills they must have if they are to fill the jobs opening in the years ahead. For even if we take off on another economic boom, there simply will not be sufficient jobs in the United States society of the 1960's-70's for those who are uneducated and unskilled.

In brief, the law provides $435 million of federal funds over a three-year period to finance the training of about 400,000 men and women for jobs known to exist in the areas in which the trainees live. Those to be trained must be out of work out of school and qualify mentally and physically for the training courses.

To date, federal officials have approved 869 projects involving 30,200 trainees in every state except Louisiana. About 3,000 have completed training, of which a paltry 2,100 have obtained jobs. A woefully slow start indeed!

Detroit's experiences with trainin-retraining are typical of most areas, and Detroit is a showcase in which to study the problems and promises of training, because for years it has stood high on the list of depressed areas with an unemployment rate far above the national average. Even in February, with auto production roaring at the fastest since 1955, joblessness in Michigan was 7.1 per cent against the national average of 6.1 per cent. In this auto capital of the world are pools of older workers whose jobs have been erased by automation of factories and who now make up a "hard core" of very long-term unemployed (out of work six months or longer). In this city are pools of young workers, both white and Negro, who are virtually unemployable because they do not have the necessary education or skills to fill jobs.

We've learned the problems and one of the big ones is that the Manpower Act isn't set up to help those whose economic need is most desperate," said MESC director Max M. Horton, when I interviewed him in Detroit recently. "The act requires that those trained have basic qualifications for a job, and many can't even read, write or talk properly. "Before we can start to train them, we must make these people literate, and this is an entirely different problem requiring a different approach."

There are other things seriously wrong too—and one is our vocational education system. Details tomorrow.
