Small Worlds Around Us

By LYNN M. WATKINS

(Register and Tribune Syndicate, 1963)

Porpoise Born Tail-First—And Active as a Cricket
The "delivery room" was a large circular tank in which a female porpoise was awaiting the arrival of the "little stranger." The "blessed event" was scheduled to occur at any moment, but while she was waiting, Mrs. Porpoise, calm, serene and unworried, swam slowly around the tank.

We were the ones that were frantic. We had watched and noticed the youngster was partially born. During the interval of delayed birth the prospective mother pursued her accustomed way, blandly assuming a state of indifference. She, being a porpoise, knew more about the biological order of birth than the humans who watched. We were panicked by ignorance.

All living creatures seem to be afraid of things they do not understand. We should have known that a wise and provident nature decreed, away back in the beginning, that those animals which must be born underwater should experience a reversal of the biological order by being born tail first. That, at the time, we did not know. But Mrs. Porpoise evidently did.

Born Swimming

A few hours after his partial appearance, the "little stranger" was born tail-first. And he was born swimming, just as active as a "cricket." The second the birth was complete, Mrs. Porpoise turned, put her bottle-like snout under the youngster's stomach and pushed him quickly to the surface. We could plainly hear the first baby gasp as the little guy gulped his very first lungful of air.

We may have imagined it, but it seemed to us that the mother heaved a sigh of relief at the baby's gasp. She appeared to have a look of concern just before the welcome, bubbling gasp. Then she relaxed and ranged up alongside her newborn. A new star had entered the aquatic firmament; a new life began its task of daily living.

The little one seemed "as fast on his feet" as his mother. Regardless of how rapidly she swam, he cruised alongside her. Like all devoted relatives and friends of the family, we were anxious to find out how much the youngster weighed, how long he was and what other pertinent facts we could discover about this little stranger just born in an unusual environment—a concrete tank instead of the open sea.

Displays Confidence

Once again his wise mother displayed her confidence in her human friends by actually leading junior into our waiting hands as soon as she understood what we had in mind. She calmly waited at the water's surface while we lifted the little fellow out, measured and weighed him. Exactly 22½ inches long, he tipped the scales at 23 pounds. He was every ounce a bouncing baby.

Poor little guy—he would never see his father. The old man was, we hoped, somewhere at sea enjoying the life a porpoise deserves. It had been several months since junior's mother had seen him... since that time she had become a tourist attraction.

The young one would remain with mother for several months during which time she would teach him all the things he must know. In the great volume of the book of the sea, she would slowly turn the pages and he, an eager young porpoise, would learn and profit by her teachings. From her, too, he would learn tolerance, kindness and the ever-present tenderness so characteristic of mothers everywhere.

Dennis P.
I think fraternities are for the frightened.
Mr. H. P.
He'll be better off if he joins mine.

Dennis P.
It's my Dad's fondest hope that I join the Greek-letter fraternity at college to which he belonged, even though it was another chapter and another era. They're a nice enough bunch, but I don't need that sort of a crutch. It's like saying hello to yourself every day and I'd rather say hello to a wider circle. There's something sacred and snobbish about fraternities. I don't need or want that sort of protection. I can make friends on my own.

Mr. H. P.
Each generation of my family has had at least one man in Kappa Alpha, the oldest of them all. There's nothing like it to help a young fellow grow socially. My two closest friends, to this day, are men I met first as fraternity brothers. But Don knows I have other friends too. It's just that at 19 he's foolish to turn down a ready-made circle of buddies. They constitute a core of wonderful contacts for the rest of his life.

The Council:
According to a University of Michigan survey, there's the "fraternity type" and the non-fraternity fellow. The former is described as an extrovert, athlete, politician, and undistinguished scholar. Non-members, on the average, get higher grades, are more creative, original, non-conformist. The consensus is that fraternities, while a good thing, will get less and less important on campuses.

Everything must come to an end, Mr. P., and if Don chooses to have the old tie with him, please, no moaning at the bar. Blame it on his mother's side of the family, but he prefers to furrow out his own circles of associates rather than inherit them. In addition to growing socially, he's out to grow intellectually and emotionally. "You don't make fraternity men out of people with broad horizons," declared a Williams College professor recently. Well, there are exceptions to that view, but Don isn't aiming to be one. We think he'll make the right "contacts," Mr. P., on his own and as your son rather than your "brother."

Educational Course Given Employees

Allen F. Perry, branch manager of the Medford branch of the U. S. National Bank, has announced an educational course on the operations of local and state governments is being given to all employees this month.

The course, entitled "Practical Citizenship Workshop" is being presented in seven weekly sessions. How to become active and effective in local politics with the party of the individual's choice is also being covered by the workshop, Perry stated.

The course is non-partisan and does not deal with any specific political or governmental issues.
