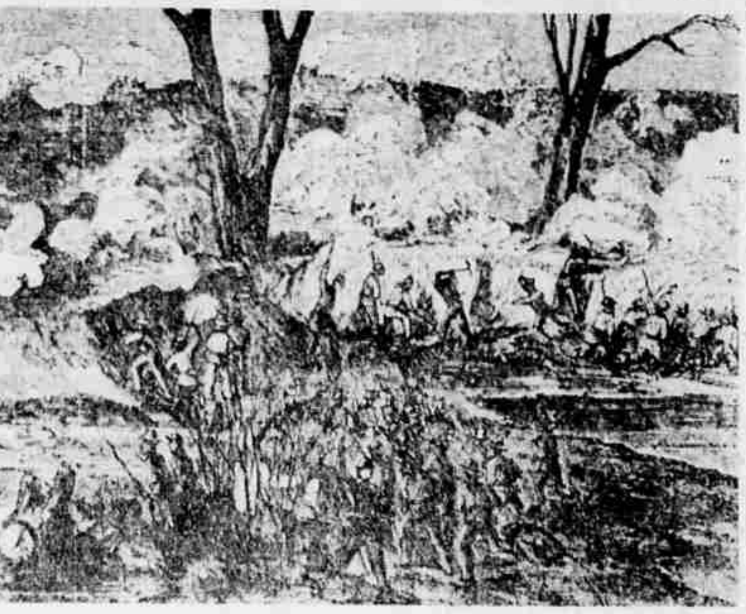
THIS WAS THE CIVIL WAR



TOUCH OF GUILE – In April, 1863, as General Grant moved his army south against the Confederate stronghold at Vicksburg, Miss., he added a touch of guile to confuse his enemies. To cover his march and to confuse the Confederates, he sent his cavalry on a raiding expedition east of the city. Then he sent Maj. Gen. William T. Sherman to make a feint at the city from the north near Haines' Bluff. The raid and the feint were successful. Because of them, Lt. Gen. John C. Pemberton, commander of the city, could muster only 4,000 to 6,000 men to oppose Grant's army of 40,000 crossing the Mississippi river. Here, from the Library of Congress collection, is a drawing of Sherman's attack at Haines' Bluff. (UPI)

Grant's Tricks at Vicksburg

By MERTON T. AKERS
UPI Correspondent

As April 1963 waned, Maj. Gen. Ulysses S. Grant moved his army south against the Confederate stronghold of Vicksburg, Miss., and added a touch of guile to confuse the Rebels.

His transports had run the batteries at Vicksburg safely and lay on the west bank of the Mississippi, battered but usable, well below the city and out of range.

Now it remained to march his army through the bayous of northern Louisiana across from Vicksburg over what the natives called roads but nearly bottomless in mud.

The corps of Maj. Gen. John A. McClernand led the expedition, bridging bayous and streams and corduroying impassable roads with logs. Part of the corps commanded by Maj. Gen. James Birdseye McPherson followed.

To cover his southward march and throw dust into the eyes of Confederate Lt. Gen. John C. Pemberton, commanding at Vicksburg, Grant reached into his bag of tricks.

On Raiding Expedition

First he sent his cavalry on a raiding expedition east of Vicksburg.

Then he sent Maj. Gen. William T. Sherman to make a feint north of Vicksburg in the neighborhood where Sherman had failed in a drive from the north at Christmas time.

The cavalry raiders started April 17 – the day Grant's transports had run the Vicksburg batteries – from LaGrange, Tenn., on the Mississippi-Tennessee line southeast of Memphis.

The raid was led by an unlikely character named Benjamin H. Grierson. He was colonel of the 6th Illinois Cavalry and at the moment was commanding a brigade.

He started the raid with his own regiment, the 7th Illinois Cavalry, the 2nd Iowa Cavalry, the 2nd Iowa Cavalry and six guns – all told, about 1,700 men.

Before the war Grierson had been a music teacher in Illinois and a part-time grocer. Furthermore he disliked horses. His antipathy dated from the time he was a boy when a horse kicked him in the face and left a scar.

Troopers Rode South

Grierson's well - equipped troopers, leading spare horses, rode south from LaGrange into the corridor between two railroads–the Mobile & Ohio, which ran south from Corinth, Miss., through the central part of the state and the Mississippi Central, which ran south from Memphis through Jackson, the Mississippi capital, and on into the lower part of Louisiana.

On the second day out Grierson ran into the first opposition, a militia cavalry company near Ripley, Miss., about 30 miles from LaGrange. This he brushed aside.

An April 20 Grierson culled out about 175 men who showed signs of weakening and sent them back with a few prisoners and a drove of captured mules and horses to LaGrange under Maj. Hiram Love and the 2nd Iowa. Love was ordered to make a great commotion to deceive the Confederates into thinking the expedition was turning back.

The next day Col. Edward Hatch took his 2nd Iowa east and broke the Mobile & Ohio near Macon, Miss. Then he swung north for a short distance to decoy the pursuing Rebel cavalry, which by this time was swarming over the countryside. After that he joined the main body farther south. Hatch succeeded so well that Grierson's main body was about 70 miles farther south before the Confederates learned the truth.

One company of the 7th Illinois raided along the Mobile & Ohio south of Macon and eventually joined Grierson when the main body had swung west at Newton, Miss., directly east of Vicksburg and Jackson. There he cut the railroad running east from Jackson and Vicksburg into Alabama.

When Pemberton heard that Grierson had turned west he set a trap at Union Church, Miss., southeast of Grand Gulf, a Confederate strong point on the Mississippi.

But a squad of nine volunteers from the 7th Illinois, led by Sgt. Richard Surby and called the "Butternut Guerillas" because they wore Confederate uniforms, had been ranging the country ahead of Grierson. One of them learned of the ambush. Grierson turned back east to Brookhaven, Miss., and avoided the trap.

From there Grierson followed the Mississippi Central, destroying it as he went into Louisiana and to Baton Rouge where on May 2 he joined the Federal forces of Maj. Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks.

The ex-music teacher who disliked horses had raided for 600 miles in 16 days, had cut three rail lines, had torn up 60 miles of telegraph wire and had isolated Jackson, the capital, for several days.

Grierson's report was all facts, no rhetoric.

"We killed and wounded about 100 of the enemy," he reported, "captured and paroled over 500 prisoners . . . destroyed over 3,000 stand of arms . . . captured 1,000 horses and mules . . . Our loss was 3 killed, 7 wounded, 5 left en route sick . . . and 9 missing . . ."

One of his teen-age troopers, Henry C. Forbes, called the raid "a strenuous game, rather a bloody one, intensely exciting, but not necessarily very dangerous."

Grant called it "one of the most brilliant cavalry exploits of the war . . ."

The Columbus (Miss.) Republic agreed with Grant, at least in part.

". . . The boldest, and we may say one of the most successful, raids of cavalry . . . has been made (we say with shame) through the very center of Mississippi . . ."

After describing damage at several places, the newspaper said that in Starkville, Miss., "Hale & Murdock's hat wagon, loaded with wool hats, passing through at the time was captured. They gave the hats to the negroes and took the mules. Starkville can boast of better head covering for its negroes than any other town in the state."

Sherman's feint at Haine's Bluff, north of Vicksburg, was even more successful in deceiving Pemberton.

He loaded 10 regiments of infantry on transports. He spread "his command over the decks of the transports with orders that every man should . . . look as numerous as possible," his engineering officer, Capt. William L. B. Jenney, reported.

Rear Adm. David D. Porter, commanding the gunboat fleet, sent as many fighting ships as he could spare and added for good measure a blacksmith boat with orders to fire up every forge and make as much smoke as possible.

"The gunboats and transports whistled and puffed and made all the noise they could," Jenney continued. "They showed themselves to the garrison . . . and then drifted back and landed the men, who were marched through the woods . . . until they were seen by the enemy . . . (and) taken on board to go through the same farce again."

The gunboats fired a few shells the first day, April 30, and a few more the next.

The Haine's Bluff commander was impressed and quickly called on Pemberton for reinforcement. "Here is the real attack," he said.

Pemberton promptly turned back forces he had sent south against Grant's main army.

The panting Confederate infantry dashed back to Haine's Bluff in time to see Sherman's men leave. Then Grant messaged Sherman:

"All right; join me below Vicksburg."

Thanks to Sherman and Grierson, Pemberton could only muster 4,000 to 6,000 men to oppose Grant's crossing below Vicksburg.
