The Medical Roundup

Lead Poisoning in Children People who live in old houses, and particularly houses in the southern part of this country where the sun is so strong as to blister paint on the railings of porches, should remember that some small children love to eat that paint.

After eating, the child is likely to lose his appetite and to complain of abdominal colics, with severe constipation and perhaps also vomiting and headaches. Then, when the doctor finds an anemia, he should think of lead poisoning.

He can be sure of lead poisoning when the laboratory man notices peculiar changes in the red blood cells. The laboratory expert can measure the amount of lead in the urine, and if he finds it abnormally high, the diagnosis is made.

Sometimes an observant and able x-ray man will make the diagnosis simply by noting that the "growing lines" at the ends of the long bones are darker than they should be, due to the accumulation in them of lead.

Recently, Dr. Otto P. Preuss of Cleveland said that in just the one city of Cincinnati, 53 cases of such lead poisoning in children had recently been reported.

Older people who have just developed what looks like an ulcer had better be operated and a biopsy performed to determine if it is cancer. This and other information about cancer is contained in Dr. Alvarez' 25-cent booklet on the subject. Get your copy by sending 25 cents and a self-addressed, stamped envelope with your request for it to Dr. Walter C. Alvarez, Dept. MMT, Box. 937, Des Moines 4, Iowa.
