

Peace Corps Training Program Slated at University of Oregon

Eugene—The University of Oregon has concluded an agreement with the Peace Corps to conduct a training program this summer for a group of volunteers who will be assigned for two years in Nepal. University President Arthur S. Fleming has announced.

The agreement under a grant of $124,000 from the Peace Corps calls for the university to conduct an 11-week training program in Eugene for a group of 40 men and 8 women, to begin June 21.

The trainees are now being chosen by the Peace Corps from applicants from all over the country. When they have completed their training, they will be assigned as volunteers in Nepal.

In Nepal the volunteers will assist the village and community development workers of the Nepalese government. These workers are engaged in a program to help the people of Nepal's 35,000 villages to help themselves toward modernization.

The councils of these villages, called Panchayats, are taking the lead in community development with the assistance of the Nepalese Village Development Workers. The Peace Corps volunteers will work with them to show the people of the villages how to identify and solve some of their basic problems.

The Peace Corp Community Development Training Program at the university has been made the responsibility of the University of Oregon Institute of International Studies and Overseas Administration. John Gange, institute director, has named Dr. Egbert S. Wengert, professor and head of the political science department, to serve as project director.

To advise the institute and to assist in shaping the program, President Fleming has named an advisory committee of faculty members with experience in Nepal and in the work of the Peace Corps, with Gange as committee chairman.

The training program will emphasize language study, study of the culture of Nepal, community development.
