In addition to his training in medical technology, Woolsey took another 12 months of classroom and laboratory work at the University of Oregon Medical School in cytological hospital, to qualify him for this study. The laboratory technician exemplifies one of the specialized areas in hospital careers open to interested young people today.

Dawkins Defends Dealings With City

Ashland - William Dawkins, president of the Oak Knoll Land corporation, Tuesday defended his firm's dealings with the city of Ashland in a talk before the Ashland Chamber of Commerce. The corporation, which is developing a $6 million, 300-unit adult community around the Ashland golf course, has obtained city water and sewer services by special arrangement with the city council. The area planned for development is at present outside of the city limits. The city council, in accordance with a set policy, has refused water service to individuals outside the city limits unless they are first annexed to the city.

In his talk, Dawkins explained that the council made an exception in his case because of the economic impact his project would have on the Ashland area. Three hundred couples living in homes and multiple dwelling units constructed by the corporation would bring in 1.5 million fresh dollars to Ashland every year, he said. These persons would contribute between $90,000 and $100,000 a year in school taxes but not occupy a single seat in any school, because the corporation is not selling a lot or home to any family with children under 18, he added. Dawkins reiterated his willingness to have the project land annexed to the city when and if the area ever becomes contiguous to city boundaries, although he pointed out that his firm couldn't obligate persons who buy the lots and homes on this matter.

Alert Students Help To Avert Tragedy

Delake, Ore.—Alert students helped avert a tragedy here Wednesday afternoon when three Silverton High School seniors were struck by a large wave in the surf.

Vicki Reed, 17, was given artificial respiration after swallowing sea water and later was reported in fair condition.

A human chain formed by other students helped in the rescue after one of them, Mike Jarvel, had gone to the girl's aid.

The girl and Hank Shenk and Skip Adams, both 18, went into the surf. Jarvel and other students on the beach saw the big breaker strike them. The girl cried out and disappeared.

Jarvel rushed in and grabbed the girl. Other students, with the aid of a rope obtained from a concessionaire, formed a human chain.

All four were brought safely to shore.

The girl was given artificial respiration by the Devils Lake fire department. About 120 Silverton High School seniors had gone to the coast for an outing.

Fungus Studied as Possible Cause of Cirrhosis of Liver

By DELOS SMITH, UPI Science Editor

New York—To some "drinking peop" it will be encouraging to know there are still mysteries in the causes of cirrhosis of the liver. Many a lay person assumes there is but one cause—excessive and prolonged indulgence in alcoholic drink.

A distinguished professor of medicine, Dr. Charles S. Davidson of Harvard, is authority both for there being multiple causes and the mysteries which surround some of them. His own suspicions were aimed at certain plants and some of the funguses which can infect them.

These can reach the human liver by the same route liquor does. He wants medical science to take up an exhaustive investigation of the plant and fungi kingdoms on the grounds that evidence from animals demonstrate some are capable of poisoning the liver.

Nothing Humorous

Cocktail party humorists make jokes about cirrhosis but there is absolutely nothing humorous in this disease process. It begins with liver inflammation and liver degeneration and leads through a complex course to death of the organ—and death of the person dependent upon it. "The causes of cirrhosis are by no means entirely known," he said in the New England Journal of Medicine.

"In alcoholic patients malnutrition, probably alcohol and possibly virus hepatitis (liver inflammation) need to be considered."

"Among patients without alcoholism hepatitis virus and malnutrition have been invoked as possible causes, and yet neither alone nor in combination do these seem to be sufficient to account for the worldwide presence but varied incidence of the disease."

There is the sassafras plant. Rats required to consume it in quantity develop not only cirrhosis but liver cancers. Everyone knows human beings in the past made tea of it, and some still do.

And there are the heliotrope, ragwort and rattlebox plants. Non-scientific herb medicine makes use of them, yet farm animals which graze on them have a marked way of developing liver cirrhosis.

Funguses Infect Plants

He pointed to several funguses which will, if they have the chance, infect rice, grasses, grains, peas, beans and even sweet potatoes. In cattle, turkeys, sheep, ducklings, pigs and other animals they have been associated with cirrhosis.

Davidson reminded that some antibiotics are derived from funguses and that some of them "will cause liver-function abnormalities." But he definitely was not being an alarmist—there was no desire to scare. He was pointing to a group of vegetable chemical mysteries which need solving.

In a few instances some of these plants have been associated with damaged human livers. Some of them are to be found in most parts of the world, he continued. "Their use as foods, in 'bush tea,' as herbal medicines or their growth (in the cases of funguses) on common foods, encourage the thought that they may be of etiologic (causative) importance" in liver cirrhosis.

Automotive Chain Caters to Women

New York—A nationwide automotive service chain so appreciates women drivers, and their purchasing power, it designs all its outlets for their convenience.

Vanderbilt Automotive Centers, Inc., says male customers in its department store and shopping center units take this "new look" in their stride, seem happy to discover a pastel colored showroom, potted plants, air-conditioned waiting rooms and lounges and product displays reminiscent of supermarkets.

Small Worlds Around Us By LYNN M. WATKINS (Register and Tribune Syndicate, 1963)

Good Mother Suddenly Kills All of Her Babies They loved her very much, lavished on her a great deal of attention, and became terribly worried when she developed infanticidal tendencies. Some emotional disorder had upset her motherly instincts and thrown them into reverse. Evidently she needed, and very badly, psychiatric help, but who could or would psychoanalyze a cat? So her owners worried, hoping she would overcome her strange and terrible compulsion by repeated adventures with motherhood. Whatever her psychosis was, it was evidently deep seated, for she never recovered from her obsessional thoughts and actions.

Her name was Floss; in all ways her actions were normal and characteristically cat-like. Her owners were proud of her. She had long, soft, silky hair; bright, intelligent eyes; and a lovely disposition. She was normal in all ways until she became a mother. Then it happened, something slipped in her mental processes and she became a compulsive monster.

Owners Happy Her owners were mildly pleased when they observed the visible evidence that a litter of kittens would shortly come to delight the children. Besides, some friends of the family had manifested an interest in owning a cat exactly like the gentle, soft-eyed Floss.

With the inevitability of biological progression, it happened one night, Floss became the mother of five kittens. No one could tell the cat's owner or whether or not Floss arranged the kittens, at meal times, in the regular order of their arrival into this world. It seemed so, however, for every time the kittens were lined up for their frequent meals, they were always in the same position. After the meal was served the five little ones became jumbled and mixed, but when the next feeding time arrived they were all arranged in the proper order.

Floss was a good mother. She lavished all her attentions on her offspring; she evidently loved them very much. Growth progressed and the babies opened their eyes and began to awkwardly fall over one another in moments of gentle play. They began to teeter on their wobbly legs, half walked and half crawled out of the box that held them. They would soon be on their own.

Then, one bright, sunny morning the housewife walked through the garage with basket of wash, and found four of the baby cats dead on the concrete driveway. Detected a Movement Out of the corner of her eye she detected a movement on the top of the garage. She looked up just in time to see Floss drop the last kitten. The little thing plopped with a dull thud on the hard concrete.

It was weeks before the housewife overcame the shock of what she had seen. In the meantime Floss, the infanticidal cat-mother, became a normal, affectionate pet. Months later, and again the enactment of new life; four kittens this time. Again the demonstration of excessive mother love. Floss licked them, fed them, showered affection on them and displayed toward them a great love. But in spite of the family's watchfulness, the crime was repeated. The kittens, all four of them, were dropped from the garage roof onto the hard concrete. Poor, mixed-up Floss at certain times became obsessed with a terrible compulsion; her mental derangement compelled her to commit infanticide.
