Battle of Front, Rear Engined Cars Attracts In Indianapolis Chase

Indianapolis — The annual Indianapolis Memorial Day 500 is the nation's No. 1 racing event for two reasons: It attracts the greatest crowd of any sporting event (an estimated quarter of a million people), and it pays the most money (total purse last year was more than $426,000).

This year's Indianapolis 500-mile race will set new records — and probably in speed around the track, in crowds and prize money. Advance ticket sale is running 30 per cent ahead of last year and there have been more spectators at practice sessions than anyone can remember.

The big attraction at the Indianapolis Speedway this year, of course, is the much-heralded "battle" between the conventional, four - cylinder, front-engined race car and the V-8, rear-engined, road-racing type machine. The fact that 10 of the 11 challengers are powered by versions of the Ford, Chevrolet and Buick engines adds to the interest.

The horsepower up front — or in back, as the case may be — is obviously not the only requirement for winning the Indianapolis 500 — or any other race. Of equal importance is the suspension and the "ride" provided by the Monroe shock absorbers used on almost all the race cars. It's a ride designed, not for comfort, but for firm control at 140 miles an hour around the curves and 180 on the straight-aways.

Successful Design For the 13th consecutive year, Monroe ride control engineers have been at the Indianapolis Speedway to help mechanics and drivers achieve the right shock absorber control for maximum safe speed. It's not unusual for a change of shock absorbers to increase the speed of a race car as much as five miles an hour.

A. J. Watson, who is the Indianapolis Speedway's most successful car builder (five winners in the last eight years), isn't about to junk his successful design — yet. Of the rear-engined cars, he says: "They go fast because they're lighter and, if we were lighter, we'd go even faster." So, he has reduced the weight of his new cars this year and found a way to put more horses up front in the engine.

U.S. Quint Eyes Role of Spoiler

Rio De Janeiro — (UPI) — The United States, one of the pre-tournament favorites, was ready to play the role of spoiler today in an attempt to salvage its reputation in the world's major basketball championships.

The Yanks have no chance to win the title, but can prevent Brazil from clinching the crown when the two teams meet Saturday on the final day of the tournament.

Brazil broke a first place tie with Russia and remained the only unbeaten squad by turning back the Soviet Union 90-79 in a near-riotous game Thursday night. Earlier, the United States finally lived up to its advance billing by romping over Italy 101-73 for its third triumph in five games.

Only the United States is now in a position to stop the Brazilians from completing a perfect six-game sweep, and if they are successful they can leave the door open for either Russia or Yugoslavia to create a deadlock.

Yugoslavia is a solid favorite to defeat France tonight and boost its record to 4-1, the same as Russia's.
