Visitors Invited To View Nation's Public Gardens

(Editor's note: The following release concerns public rose gardens throughout the United States. Some are located in Oregon near enough to this area that local rose enthusiasts and other gardeners may wish to visit them on a week end trip or as they travel to and from Portland for other reasons. Other public rose gardens in the west and across the country could be visited while families are vacationing. Listed here are the gardens in Oregon. A list of all the gardens and All-America Rose Selections since 1940 may be obtained by writing All-America Rose Selections, Public Information Office, 247 Park Avenue, New York, N.Y. June is the "month of roses."

It's the time when the "queen of flowers" reigns supreme over all gardens as she bursts into her first flower finery of the season. With beautiful rose blooms everywhere, home and public gardens will be premiering a colorful performance that will run continuously for the next few months.

While one prize rose bush dressed in its best bloom will steal the scene in any garden, when hundreds of famous roses join the cast to stage a show, the event is a scented spectacle.

Thousands of the world's prize roses are the stars of rose spectaculars during June at the country's many public parks and gardens. There are more than 120 municipal, state and private gardens across the nation that invite visitors to view the shows free.

A visit to the nearby public gardens - or those within short driving distance - makes a pleasant one day's outing the whole family will enjoy. Some of the famous rose gardens more distantly located will make interesting and restful stops on this summer's vacation or motor tour.

The show-stoppers of these spectaculars are always the world's prize roses - the All-America Rose selections. Taking center stage this year will be the newest recipients of the country's highest garden award, the 1964 All-America Rose winners. Glorious displays of these new prize varieties will give rose lovers their first glimpse of the blooms that will be in the spotlight in home gardens next year.

Other famous names in the all-star cast include the 1963 AARS winners, Tropicana and Royal Highness, and the 1962 titleholders, Christian Dior, Golden Slippers, John S. Armstrong and King's Ransom. Gardens are kept up-to-date by contributions from the rose industry through All-America Rose Selections, its pre-testing organization. AARS conducts its public gardens program in the public interest and in support of municipal and state projects of beautification and landscaping.

During June, the month of roses, and in the summer months that follow, public gardens feature special events and clinics centered about the care and culture of roses. Special rose days, guided tours and instruction are some of the highlights.

Here are some of the nearby public rose gardens that invite you to visit the free show now and in the next few months.

In Portland are the International Rose Test Gardens in Washington Park, 228 Southwest Wright Avenue; and the Memorial Rose Garden at Lewis and Clark college, 0615 Southwest Palatine Hill road.
