Reviewer Calls Italian Film 'Intellectually Dishonest'

Editor's note: The following motion picture review, volunteered by a perceptive staff member, is in some ways a minority report. Others who have seen the film agree that it is shocking, but that despite its obvious bias and sensationalism, it has something to say about the human condition in the second half of the 20th century.

It was a beautiful evening in Medford last night. We wasted two hours of it by going to see "Mondo Cane," the Italian film currently showing at the Holly theater.

The title literally means "it's a dog's world," which is the producer's clever way of saying that life is a wretched business and that people are no damn good.

To begin with, the film, and by implication the men who put it together, is intellectually dishonest. Not to put too fine a point on it, the thing is an out and out lie.

The movie begins with a brief foreword, which a narrator intones in a sardonic baritone voice, claiming that the following 1 1/2 hours of footage is "true." It concludes with the fatuous statement that the scenes have been "objectively reported."

Color Travelogue
Then the viewer is off on a color travelogue of human muck, mire, ignorance, superstition, inhumanity and depravity, revealed in such bizarre locales as a jungle in New Guinea, an animal cemetery in Los Angeles, a Gurkha village in Nepal, the French Riviera, the nuclear-blasted atoll of Bikini, and the underground caverns of a Trappist monastery in Europe.

Many of the scenes were shocking and revolting, and the audience alternated between startled gasps, stunned silence or nervous titters of mortification.

The series of brief sequences were held together by relating widely varying attitudes toward something in different parts of the world. For example, women's breasts were developed as objects of sexual attraction during a sequence shot on the Riviera. One scene showed American sailors rushing from one side of their ship to the other to watch a bevy of bikini-clad beauties in a powerboat, teasingly circling the vessel.

Suddenly, the scene shifted and the camera zoomed in for a close-up of a native woman in New Guinea nursing a baby pig at her breast, her newborn child having died a few days earlier.

Another contrast centered around dogs. In one scene shot in a Hong Kong restaurant, beautiful black Chow dogs were shown being cut up and cooked. Again the gimmick-ridden camera moved in for a closeup, this time of several Chinese eating the meat with obvious relish and enjoyment.

Then without warning the viewer was in an animal cemetery in Los Angeles (where else?) and was treated to the spectacle of watchful lonely old women weep and sob at funerals for their dead pets. One didn't know whether to feel more pity for the wretched women, or for the cameraman who coldly and insensitively filmed the sequence.

The point of it? Simply that in one part of the world dogs are eaten as a delicacy, and in another part of the world they are given expensive and formal burial services.

Hardly a profound message, you'll forgive us for saying, nor is it something that isn't generally known.

Nothing Enlightening
For that matter, with one or two exceptions, there was nothing enlightening, instructive or even really entertaining in the whole movie. Usually, the producers worked too hard at establishing what we already know: that man is in many ways scarcely removed from the animal world, that the veneer of civilization is extremely thin in even the most sophisticated among us, that the world has developed unevenly, and that many religious rites are simply instances of ignorant superstition performed with solemnity.

The film-makers had a real opportunity to score
