KENNEDY AND THE SEC - CIRCA 1934

"Among Franklin Roosevelt's shrewdest moves was his appointment of Joseph P. Kennedy as first chairman of the Securities & Exchange Commission in 1934," said Edwin D. Etherington, president of the American Stock Exchange, while we lunched. "Kennedy was a real Wall Street pro and he knew all the angles. Putting that sort of man in charge of regulating Wall Street after the market collapse had made 'stocks' a dirty word was a stroke of genius."

Etherington paused, smiled thoughtfully. "Now Joe's son is in the White House and the SEC has just asked Congress for the broadest revision of the securities laws since the basic legislation went on the books in 1933-34. Wouldn't it be apt if son talked to father now and then, on father's urging, put the President's power behind the SEC to help push through the new law this year?"

Wouldn't it be apt indeed, Mr. President!

Next week a Senate subcommittee will start hearings on the SEC's proposals for a new law to raise standards in the securities markets and increase the protection of this nation's investors.

The key proposal would compel big, widely-held companies with shares traded in the huge over-the-counter market to obey the same rules of full disclosure that corporations with shares listed on an exchange have obeyed for almost 30 years. An unlisted company of specified size would have to file periodic reports revealing its financial position and operations. When insiders – directors, officers, large stockholders – traded in its stock, the company would have to disclose this to the public. It would have to provide full proxy information to owners of its shares.

Other proposals would raise the entry standards into the securities business for brokers, dealers and salesmen and would try to assure wider dissemination of information about companies "going public" – selling stocks for the first time.

There's no question that the proposals would add to the protection of investors. Protection of the investor was and is the fundamental aim of the securities laws and the SEC.

There's no question that the proposals are reasonable. This has been a prime objective of the SEC from the start and since its special study was completed, SEC officials and leaders of the financial community have been working in closest harmony to prepare a bill which all responsible elements in the securities industry would favor.

There's no question that all Wall Street's leaders welcome the legislation. Etherington's comment during our talk underlines his enthusiastic attitude. The same attitude has been expressed by New York Stock Exchange officials, spokesmen for the over-the-counter markets and other stock exchanges, individual brokers, etc.

The fact is that no one can argue convincingly that the "double standard" which has existed through these years between companies with listed shares and those with unlisted shares is in the best interest of the investor. It simply is not.

The fact is that the "full disclosure" provisions would apply in the first two years only to over-the-counter companies with 750 or more stockholders and $1 million or more in assets and, after this waiting period, only to companies with 500 or more stockholders and $1 million or more in assets. Of tens of thousands of companies with shares being traded in the over-the-counter market today, only about 3,600 would be affected, many of these have long been voluntarily providing the information the new law would require, and banks and insurance companies already are heavily regulated.

"There is not one thing in the new laws to which Wall Street or anybody else can legitimately object . . .

"There is not a single provision in the law to which brokers and businessmen generally cannot subscribe and still maintain a good business . . . "

Who said that? That fabulously successful stock pool operator, Joseph P. Kennedy, on July 3, 1934. How about interviewing him, Mr. President, and getting behind this bill to improve the law your father was the first to administer 29 years ago?

LIFE THREATENED – Circuit Judge Julian P. Wilamoski, 53, is shown in his Chicago office after receiving a letter threatening him with death for having ordered the Nazi Party to vacate its headquarters because of 50 building violations. The letter was turned over to the FBI, who recommended that Judge Wilamoski be given a bodyguard while agents sought to track down the writer. (UPI)
