Child Abuse Legislation Plans Are Being Formed

A first step in a national approach to protecting children from physical abuse by their parents or caretakers has been taken by the Children's bureau, Mrs. Katherine B. Oettinger, chief, announced today.

The states will shortly be receiving suggested legislative language which will require that all cases of child abuse be reported to the appropriate police authority by the doctor who sees the child.

Purpose of the suggested language is to identify children in danger so that they can be protected. It is not to punish parents, although criminal action may result.

At the present time, many doctors are fearful of reporting cases where they suspect child abuse because they may face criminal or civil suit on the part of the parent or caretaker. The suggested law grants them immunity from such action.

For Very Young

The suggested law is directed principally to the very young child who cannot speak for himself but who, under normal circumstances, would have parents who would speak for him. Reporting of incidences of abuse to older children also would be required.

"We need to have these children identified if they are to be helped," Mrs. Oettinger said. "Until we have mandatory reporting of child abuse cases, the hands of such agencies as the courts and welfare departments, equipped to help protect the child, are tied when child abuse cases are listed as 'accidental'."

Cases of child abuse apparently are increasing but there is at present no accurate national data to show the incidence.

Improved radiological techniques now readily available will help the doctor to determine the extent of physical injury and should show previous injuries in various stages of healing, if such exist.

In Some States

Legislation to require mandatory reporting of child abuse cases now exists in some form or is being considered in several states, including California, Wyoming, Colorado, Indiana, Pennsylvania, New Mexico, Ohio, Florida, Maryland, Michigan, and Missouri.

The proposed legislative language, which must be acted upon by each state which does not now have such a law, was developed by the bureau in conjunction with the office of the general counsel of the U.S. department of health, education, and welfare. It is based on the findings of two groups of consultants, who met in January and May of last year with the Children's bureau. Material developed from their suggestions has since been widely reviewed by doctors, lawyers, social workers, juvenile court judges, hospital administrators, and interested citizens.
