MANOR-ISMS . . .

By ETHELYN EVANS

To fellow Manor members and valley friends who enjoy the out-of-doors in a natural state—or as near as possible now—days, may I suggest another route to the Central Oregon-Bend recreation area?

We hit the jack-pot by driving on the freeway to Salem—the wild lilacs were so beautiful and so abundant—then taking No. 22 going east.

We didn't know Oregon had such a fine state road—really a freeway for many miles through residential sections and prosperous farming areas. It follows the turbulent Santiam river, as beautiful as the McKenzie, I think. The second of two dams is the "Detroit," and above that an enormous man-made lake in a wide canon between high mountains, with lovely shoreline and islands. We passed through a logging and sawmill section which would be interesting to any who had never seen those industries, and beyond that the road plunges into the forest—long stretches of woody roads with bosky dells and the Santiam a constant companion. (We chose this route because it was at Detroit that my husband—just graduated from Yale Forest school—was given his first appointment as forest assistant. Now, even the placed he lived and worked in is under the lake water.)

All this section is a very popular recreation area; we could see fishermen and campers everywhere, but none were underfoot. Fortunately, we came along after the early morning rush, so found scarcely any traffic and no trucks, not even logging trucks.

It is well to start from Salem, as one gets beautiful vistas up narrow canyons down which the stream is plunging; around the next bend or two, it curves back to the road again. The canyon narrows rapidly and often the road is a ribbon with the mountain close on the left, and the river bank on the right—a good road all the way, however. The stream grows smaller and smaller and finally makes a right-angle off into the Cascades at its source. It seems incredible that this small creek, plus its even smaller tributaries and a waterfall or two, could supply sufficient water for those big dams and the lake and furnish water for reservoirs and generate power.

Highway 22 joins 126, the road we took through the Santiam pass into Bend on our last trip, past all the gorgeous snow-capped mountains I described after that journey. At the town of "Sisters," if any are still with me, we part. You can go back by three different routes, but we kept on east heading through Spokane, Wash., to Flathead lake in Montana—my native state.

The last night before leaving the Manor, young Howard James Kennett from southern Oregon college English and Music departments, gave a piano concert in the Manor auditorium. This young man is transferring completely to music, which is not surprising. He plays extraordinarily well, with feeling, expression, and a "personality" interpretation. In my humble unauthoritative opinion, he shows no trace of mere mechanical playing which comes out dead music.

Members were appreciative and enthusiastic but I am sure that if his talent and, perhaps, past performances had been more fully described, others would have cancelled summer evening activities to come to hear him. Many of those who were there kept telling all and sundry what they had missed.
